BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of Agriculture Act, Chapter A-10, R.S.C., 1970.

FARM CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 24, 1975

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to which was referred Bill C-34, intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, April 22, 1975 examined the said bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "thirty-five" and substitute the word "forty" in lines 43 and 49 on page 2, in lines 7 and 16 on page 3, and in lines 7 and 34 on page 8.

In addition your committee desires to make two recommendations arising out of its discussions.

First, your committee would like to see the Farm Credit Corporation take on an expanded and more vigorous role in the provision of credit to farmers for the development of agricultural production in Canada.

Your committee therefore recommends that the Government consider the advisability of increasing the capital of the Farm Credit Corporation from one hundred million to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

Second, your committee is concerned that the current upward trend in the price of land and other farm capital will continue and that the loan ceilings under the Act may soon become inadequate for the needs of both new and established farmers.

Your committee therefore recommends that the Government consider the advisability of increasing the ceilings on loans made under Parts III and IV to new and young farmers from one hundred and fifty thousand to two hundred thousand dollars and of increasing the ceiling on loans made under Part II to older and established farmers from one hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Your committee believes that the changes to the Farm Credit Act embodied in this bill are important and necessary. However, it believes that perhaps a little more flexibility in corporation capital and loan ceilings would be most helpful in increasing Canada's agricultural production and bettering the conditions under which farmers operate.

Respectfully submitted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 6, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, may I by way of explanation review the projected work for the Senate during the coming week.

Dealing first of all with committees, on Tuesday the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy will meet at 9.30 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has scheduled a meeting at 2 p.m. to continue its study of Canada's relations with the United States. Also at 2 p.m. the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will hear witnesses from the Manitoba Crop Insurance Commission. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 8 p.m.

So far, honourable senators, the only committee meeting set down for Wednesday is that of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy at 3.30 p.m. However, I was informed just a moment ago that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet in camera at 2.30 p.m. to consider Bill C-19. I am sorry, honourable senators, this meeting is scheduled for Tuesday.

Senator Grosart: Three committees sitting at the same time?

Senator Perrault: Yes, but one is in camera.

Senator Grosart: But they are still sitting at the same time.

Senator Perrault: The meeting times are not simultaneous. There is a degree of overlapping.

Senator Grosart: Fifteen minutes.

Senator Perrault: Half an hour. As I have stated, the only meeting so far set down for Wednesday is that of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

On Thursday the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider the 1975-76 estimates. The Special Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3.30 p.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy will meet at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The schedule of committee work does not appear to be as heavy as in recent weeks, but I can assure honourable senators that there will be considerably more work in the chamber, so the total workload will remain heavy.

On Tuesday night we will proceed with consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on Bill C-34, and consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on Bill C-33. We will also commence the second reading debate on Bill C-44 and on Bill C-32. On Wednesday we will continue with the second reading debate on Bill C-44 and Bill C-32, and with other items on the Order Paper. In addition to the foregoing, more legislation will be coming to us next week from the other place.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I state for the record that the meeting of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 11 a.m. rather than at 8 p.m. as announced earlier. That will be on Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED STRIKE OF MONTREAL POLICE FORCE— QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he has anything to report on the threatened strike of police in the city of Montreal? I ask this because it has been rumoured that the federal government has been invited to lend the army's support to the city if the situation should become serious.

Senator Perrault: The government naturally would like to be helpful in any such eventuality. However, I can report that there has been no formal request as yet received from the Government of the Province of Quebec with respect to any emergency which might arise.

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Would the Leader of the Government inform the Senate whether he has heard anything more with respect to the situation in the ports on the St. Lawrence?

Senator Perrault: The federal government may serve today the International Longshoremen's Association with notice that the federal government will apply to the federal court for an order to enforce the legislation passed by Parliament. Representatives of the federal Department of Justice may appear on Monday to apply for a court order compelling the men to return to work. However, it is hoped by the government that none of these actions will be required and there will be a return to work. Disobedience of the order will result in the usual enforcement proceedings for disobedience, including fine and/or imprisonment. However, I repeat that the government is hopeful that there will be a voluntary return to work and that it will not be necessary to resort to these other measures.

Senator Flynn: Would the Leader of the Government tell the Senate whether it is necessary to apply to the court for an injunction to enforce the union to obey the law? Are there no direct measures that could be employed? Can the leader tell us whether the Minister of Justice is considering charging the union and its members for disobeying the law and having a fine imposed without the injunction? It seems to me illogical to ask the court to tell people that they must obey the law.

Senator Perrault: Meetings have been underway during the past two or three days in an endeavour to explore every avenue and every legal recourse. The announcement I have made to the Senate this afternoon is the last official word I have had from the Department of Labour and the Department of Justice. If other alternatives are open, I will report immediately to the Senate, hopefully this afternoon.

MULTICULTURALISM

MINISTRY OF STATE—ORGANIZATION AND BUDGET— QUESTION

Senator Yuzyk: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government when I may expect the answers to the questions I raised in this chamber on March 26 last?

Senator Perrault: I am unable to give the honourable senator a definitive answer. However, I wish to assure you that every possible effort is made to reply to questions asked in this chamber as soon as the information can be obtained. I will make a further inquiry today to determine whether there has been any accidental or inordinate delay.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Forsey for second reading of Bill C-5, to establish the Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, to amend the Broadcasting Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I congratulate the sponsor, Senator Forsey, on the manner in which he presented this important bill. Although Bill C-5 is simply a re-organization bill with regard to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission and certain functions of the Canadian Transport Commission, substituting a new administrative body, the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, there are certain criticisms which I think should be made with respect to the adoption of this bill in its present form.

Bill C-5 solidifies the position of the government vis-à-vis the provinces without their consent or consultation. The provincial ministers' conference in Quebec City in 1972 resulted in the federal government being accused of duplicating provincial telecommunications systems in licensing the CN-CP telecommunications network.

In addition, in 1973 the provincial Communications ministers' conference pleaded with Ottawa to stay out of the provincial areas of jurisdiction. Furthermore, in 1974, the provinces reacted to the federal Green Paper on Communications by reiterating that in their view the regulation of telephone rates was a matter solely within provincial jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Why should we legislate on a new commission structure when there are problems relating to federal-provincial relationship in the area of telecommunications? In my view, if we proceed with the organic law to establish a new commission, it might result in a hardening of positions which have been expressed on several occasions in statements concerning cablevision.

[English]

In this respect, the governments of Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia voiced an objection against licensing of cablevision by the commission. At present, cable licences are granted by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, which requires operators to give first priority to Canadian broadcasts in filling their channels. Today 27.7 per cent of Canadian households have cable—the highest percentage in the world.

In addition, the British North America Act does not specify whether cable television is a federal or provincial responsibility, and Quebec has already set up its own licensing agency in a direct challenge to federal authority.

Although I am not necessarily against the licensing of broadcasts by the federal government, I would prefer that an arrangement be undertaken between the federal government and the provinces as to representation of the latter on the commission.

[Translation]

In other words, a political solution should be reached on the respective responsibilities of the federal government and the provinces as to the representation of the latter on the commission.

[English]

This would mean that the government should implement at first the second phase of its program which was announced April 26, 1975, to which my colleague, Senator Grosart, referred yesterday. It is released in a paper outlining the proposals which will be presented at a federal-provincial conference on telecommunications scheduled for next month.

Adopting the second phase of the program would allow the provinces affected by the decisions of the CRTC to take part in hearings, or require the CRTC to request opinions on licensing applications, where provincial interests are concerned, from the relevant provincial regulatory body. This would be most pertinent in matters of cable broadcasting.

Furthermore, each province would be represented on the commission, since each province would be asked to appoint one part-time member, who would be selected by the federal government.

[Translation]

Thus, in the first place, were the second phase of the government's program adopted, not only would it result in a greater representation of national interests but it would also constitute a better way to orchestrate the policies of the federal and provincial governments in the field of telecommunications.

Furthermore, I fear that if we were to set up the Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission before proceeding with the second phase announced by the government, we would arrive at a matter-of-fact situation and that the conference scheduled for next month to reach a compromise would prove a lost cause in advance.

Finally, in my opinion, Bill C-5 represents a step further by the federal government aiming at consolidating its position vis-à-vis the provinces without obtaining their consent or without consulting them.

Although Bill C-5 is an organic piece of legislation, it does contain, in my opinion, some shortcomings that I shall briefly point out.

[English]

Although Bill C-5 is concerned with the internal organization and management of the new commission, with the administrative effect of the transfer of powers from the Canadian Radio-Television Commission and the Canadian Transport Commission to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, and with the safeguards of the rights of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission's members — the commissioners — and employees, the bill does not mention what will happen to the Canadian Transport Commission's members and employees working with its telecommunications committee. Although it is safe to assume that these persons will stay with the Canadian Transport Commission, or be appointed or hired by the new commission, it would be advisable to have a clause giving them the same protection conferred upon the Canadian Radio-Television Commission's members and employees.

● (1430)

By passing Bill C-5, this house will only emphasize the objections that I have just listed; it will be putting the cart before the horse. To prevent this, it would have been advisable to introduce a bill concerning the agreement between the federal government and the provinces as concerns the new telecommunications philosophy, and then to introduce Bill C-5.

[English]

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I was going to move that the bill be referred to committee. However, if there are other senators who wish to participate in this debate, I will move the adjournment of the debate to a later date.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Carter wants to close the debate on second reading, he should do so. The question can then be put on the motion for second reading.

Senator Carter: I am not the sponsor of the bill. Senator Forsey is the sponsor.

Senator Flynn: Then you might as well adjourn it on behalf of the sponsor.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, as Senator Forsey pointed out, this is an administrative bill as opposed to a policy bill. It merely enlarges the size and scope of the CRTC and transfers to the new commission jurisdiction over telecommunications other than CBC. The only policy involved is consequential on that change.

As I understand it, no questions have been raised during debate on second reading that would require extending the debate, so I am prepared to move—

Senator Flynn: Let the Speaker put the question on the motion for second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by Honourable Senator Heath, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Carter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-13, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should add a word of explanation before the question is put.

This bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and was considered yesterday. There was an amendment proposed in committee which concerned subclause (2) of clause 1. Originally it was proposed that meetings be held on 24 hours' notice to members of the commission. It was felt that perhaps this was inadequate notice, even for emergency purposes, and the proposal, which the committee thought was reasonable, is that there should be one clear day's notice of emergency meetings. This means that if notice is given on a Monday, the clear day, Tuesday, has to expire, and the meeting cannot be held until Wednesday. That seems to be reasonable.

We questioned whether or not it was sufficient to have one clear day's notice of every meeting of the commission. However, we were assured that under the rule-making powers the commission has there are provisions for notices of regular meetings, and those notices are of a much longer duration. There are commissioners, of course, who live in the area of the Territories and the Yukon but there are others who live in Ottawa, and it is only reasonable to think that there should be more than one clear day's notice for normal meetings.

The amendment would also remove the word "quorum" which was not a very happy word in the bill, and substitute the word "meeting." It seems to me that this amendment is a very simple one. I know "simple" is a dangerous word to use here, but it was not a matter of great consequence. We were told that this carries the judgment of the member of Parliament for the Yukon, who was concerned about this matter when it came before the committee of the other place.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

On motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), bill, as amended, placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I would like this order to stand at the request of the sponsor.

Order stands.

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved second reading of Bill C-367, to amend the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in the western part of Ontario, where the town of Fort Frances is located, the boundary between the Province of Ontario and the State of Minnesota is identical to the boundary between Canada and the United States. It happens to be that historic gateway to the West, the Rainy River, which was followed by the early explorers.

At this time there is a problem with the bridge connecting the two towns of Fort Frances, Ontario and International Falls, Minnesota. The bridge is in a difficult location because of the power plants there, and the installations of the pulp and paper companies, Ontario-Minnesota on the Canadian side and Boise Cascade on the American side. I believe that the present bridge in fact belongs to the pulp and paper companies.

There has been an understanding between the Governments of Canada and the United States, together with the companies, to proceed with the reconstruction of this bridge, but it does involve some rather complicated negotiations because one province, one state, two national governments and about three different levels of municipal governments are concerned in them.

It had been agreed between the Canadian Government and the American Government that each would pass complementary legislation—that is, in the Canadian Parliament and in Congress of the United States—and that they would work together in establishing an authority to proceed with the widening of the bridge. It happens that this is one of the entry points to the tourist area of northwest Ontario, the Lake of the Woods region. During summer periods, this being a two-lane bridge with customs establishments at both ends, there are serious problems and lengthy delays encountered by traffic using it, and it has become necessary to widen the bridge.

The original legislation passed by the Canadian Parliament provided that construction of the bridge was to start no later than December 31, 1975. Discussions in the American Congress led to a change in the proposed bill there. The bill, which dealt strictly with this one bridge, the Fort-Falls Bridge, was expanded into an omnibus bill covering all international bridges in the United States. Therefore, we found ourselves, having passed this act, not having legislation that coincided with the American legislation. Rather than try to get another bill through Congress, which might take a great deal of time, it was felt that it would be more sensible to amend the Canadian act and permit the local authorities to proceed with the construction of the bridge.

This bill, therefore, basically does two things. It brings the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act into line with the American legislation so that, as I indicated, a number of levels of government can work together to accomplish this undertaking. The other purpose is to postpone the date of the commencement of construction, which in the act is December 31, 1975. It is obvious that date cannot be met at this point. Construction has not started yet, and there is not even finalization on the site. This bill proposes to postpone the commencement of construction for five years, to December 31, 1979. This will give time for the further investigations that are required.

There seems to be general agreement from the Canadian side on this point. The Town of Fort Frances has passed a resolution asking that this bill be passed. The Province of Ontario does not appear to have any objections. I therefore recommend the bill for passage by the Senate.

On motion of Senator Haig, debate adjourned.

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, April 10, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Fergusson calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians to Mexico, 6th to 10th January, 1975.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I had the opportunity to visit Mexico for the first time in 1960. At that time, I was Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. The Speaker, the Right Honourable Roland Michener, had been invited by the Mexican government to represent the House of Commons at the 150th anniversary celebration of that country's independence. Because of previous engagements, and as he was in Great Britain at the time, he asked me, to my great pleasure, to represent the House of Commons in Mexico.

I came back from that visit with wonderful memories of the hospitality of Mexico and Mexicans. This year, as a member of the delegation which met with Mexican parliamentarians in Mexico in early January, I had my second experience of the kind. Again I came back with pleasant memories. I might say that they are even better since I got to know more about Mexico.

[English]

It was my pleasure and privilege earlier this year, as a member of a Canadian parliamentary delegation, to pay another visit to Mexico, our other neighbour on the North American continent. I would like at this time to report on that visit, and to share with you a few of the impressions about Mexico that I brought home.

Today's Mexico is not the Mexico of the old caricatures and third-rate Hollywood movies. It is no longer the Mexico of Zapata and Pancho Villa, of banditos and manana, of mere tortillas and tequila. Contemporary Mexico is a land in a hurry. It is a modern, hospitable, dynamic country with a definite purpose and direction. It is a people alive with dreams and brimming with the energy and determination to achieve them.

We have enjoyed diplomatic relations with Mexico for three decades. Yet, it is only very recently that we have really come to know Mexico, and realize how much we have in common with that country. For years there has been scarcely a world issue of any consequence on which Mexico and Canada, as nations of intermediate size, power and wealth, have not made common cause. We have taken similar stances on a multiplicity of issues relating to international affairs, and we have had to solve a number of similar social, economic and cultural problems. All this should have brought us closer together a long time ago, but it did not.

Up until a few years ago we were strangers on the same continent—ignorant of one another as nations and artificially separated by our mutual obsessive preoccupation with the United States of America. But times have changed. And in the past few years Canadian relations with Mexico have expanded rapidly on all fronts—political, economic, cultural and commercial. The visit two years ago of Mexico's President Echeverría to Canada resulted in our entering into important bilateral agreements which gave rise to projects and programs which are proving to be beneficial to both nations.

In the past few years, there have been trade missions to Mexico led by cabinet ministers, Canada-Mexico ministerial committees and bilateral businessmen's committee meetings. These have resulted in highly significant new business operations and have served to further strengthen and extend the network of consultation and cooperation between both governments and both private sectors.

Today, Mexico is Canada's most important diversified trading partner in Latin America. Trade between our two countries is running at somewhere between $300 million and $350 million a year. Each of our countries produces a good number of items of which the other is badly in need. For example, if we have fresh tomatoes and strawberries in January, it is thanks to Mexico. On the other hand, if they have paper on which to print their daily newspapers, in large measure it is thanks to us.

As our commercial contacts with Mexico grow, we find more and more new products in which to trade. And the new Canadian tariff preferences for developing countries are serving to further stimulate trade and help restore some of the balance. The balance still favours us quite markedly. But with the increase in the flow of goods from Mexico to Canada, and the flow of tourists from Canada to Mexico, it should not be too long before a proper balance is achieved.

Mexico has much to offer the Canadian tourist—a very different culture, a most salubrious climate, fine sea resorts and friendly people. And close to 200,000 Canadians a year make a point of visiting Mexico. It is this increase in tourism, facilitated as it has been by new developments in communications, which has, I am convinced, been most instrumental in bringing about the recent rapprochement at the governmental level. After all, if the people of our respective countries get along together and enjoy one another's company, how can their political representatives dare to do otherwise? Maybe there is something to be learned from that—a truth to be applied to the whole of the global village—that peace can only come from increased communication, not of governments with governments but of peoples with peoples.

In the field of international policy, we have walked the same road as Mexico in our relations with the People's Republic of China. Neither of our nations closed its doors to Cuba when Castro came to power. We have shared a common desire for world peace and the independence of sovereign nations in international affairs. Our views on the law of the sea, on disarmament, on protection of the environment, and the control of narcotics are all very similar.

We both share this continent with the wealthiest and most powerful nation in the world. But we are both agreed that, in spite of our friendship for the United States and in spite of its proximity, we owe it to ourselves as nations to diversify our economic and political relationships with other regions of the world.

It is as a result of all these similar outlooks that I think it worthwhile for us to keep working closely with Mexico. Mexico is our link with Latin America. Over the long haul it may be that we can do something significant towards achieving prosperity in all of the Americas.

Honourable senators, I am left, as a result of my recent visit, with the distinct impression that we are making of a heretofore little-known neighbour a close and valued friend.

The exchanges of technicians and specialists in the fields of medicine, agriculture, and industry, which have gone on for a few years now and have proven quite successful, are to continue. And they will grow, as we learned at the January meeting, to include matters more cultural in nature. As a matter of fact, the Mexican government agreed during our visit to send to Canada in the near future a major exhibition of Mexican art and culture, representing the pre-Columbian to modern periods.

The discussions we had with the Mexican parliamentarians covered trade, tourism, agriculture, and increased exchanges of technicians and technologists. We compared political structures and philosophies, and explained our respective constitutions. We exchanged ideas also on foreign investment and air transport policies.

The Mexicans expressed satisfaction with the initial experience of Mexican seasonal agriculture workers in Canada based on the Memorandum of Understanding signed between the two countries. But they did have suggestions for improvements in several of the clauses of the agreement, and for overcoming omissions.

Understandably, the Mexicans would like to see a balance achieved in their trade with us. We explained that we understood their concern and underlined the importance in this regard of continuing discussions at the ministerial and official levels. The consultations we had in January will help significantly in developing greater mutual trust and understanding. We made great strides in eradicating ignorance of one another as nations.

The Mexican emphasis, like the Canadian, seems to be on developing the kind of nationalism that will promote the Mexican economy, rather than point the finger at somebody else as the source of its problems. In other words, Mexico, as I see it, is not on the defensive. It is optimistic, forward-looking, and not the least bit paranoid. It is convinced that its economic success depends primarily on its making the required effort.

Mexico, in its fifth decade of stability, and with 35 years of economic growth behind it, appears to have licked a problem which has scuttled many a Latin American economy. That problem is that sustained growth requires political stability, but the expansion process tends to disrupt the existing social order. In Mexico, that has not happened. The present administration is headed by Luis Echeverria, a Spartan, reformist intellectual, who is youthful, industrious and technocratic. It has vowed to move the republic ahead two decades in its six years in power. And from what I saw and have read, it may well do just that.

Honourable senators, if the goal of these interparliamentary exchanges is to provide us with the opportunity of acquiring a greater appreciation of the other country's problems and aspirations, then this visit was, in my case, a success. I came back with a more profound knowledge of Mexico, and I am thankful for the opportunity of acquiring it. It cannot help but be useful to me personally and as a parliamentarian, and I hope it will be helpful to you that I have made this report.

On motion of Senator Cameron, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 6, at 8 p.m.

AIR CANADA

SERVICE BETWEEN FREDERICTON AND OTTAWA—QUESTION

Senator Burchill: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to inquire from the proper authorities in the Department of Transport as to why, according to the new timetable of Air Canada, which came into effect at the end of April, the direct flight from Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, to Ottawa, was cancelled.

Halifax, the capital of Nova Scotia, enjoys a direct flight to Ottawa; Charlottetown, the capital of Prince Edward Island, enjoys a direct flight to Ottawa; St. John's, Newfoundland, via Halifax, enjoys a direct flight to Ottawa, but we in New Brunswick, either from Fredericton or Moncton, are now being denied this service, which we have enjoyed for years and years. I protest the cancellation of this flight, and I am sure that every senator from New Brunswick joins me in this protest.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can appreciate the concern of Senator Burchill over what appears to be a reduction in the Air Canada scheduled service from the important province of New Brunswick to Ottawa. I shall initiate appropriate inquiries, and at the same time hope that the honourable senator will himself direct an inquiry to the management of Air Canada with respect to this matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to provide information to the Senate at this time with regard to federal government action regarding enforcement of the legislation ordering St. Lawrence ports longshoremen to return to work.

As I stated last week, the government has applied to the Quebec Superior Court for an injunction which would, if granted, have the effect of ordering the return of the longshoremen to work. Let me say on behalf of the government that we are what could be described as cautiously optimistic that the injunction applied for will be granted, and this will have the effect of having the men return to work.

The Minister of Justice is considering criminal prosecutions of those persons who have not obeyed the law passed by Parliament. Such criminal prosecutions would be pursuant to either the Criminal Code of Canada or Part V of the Canada Labour Code.

I hope to be able to report to the Senate the results of the government's application to the Quebec Superior Court as soon as the judgment is announced.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if the situation at the ports of the St. Lawrence has anything to do with the decision of the Minister of Justice to proclaim this week or next week—I am not sure which—the week of observance of the law in Canada; or is it because of the statement made by the Solicitor General of Canada that the criminal law pertaining to the death penalty will not be observed as long as he holds that portfolio?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, respect for the law has always been a matter of great concern to this government, and it is by a mere conjunction of events that next week is Observance of Law Week.

While I am on my feet, honourable senators, I would refer to a comment by Senator Yuzyk the other day about a question posed by him on March 26 regarding multiculturalism, and inform the house that a long reply has now been received, which I hope to be able to give tomorrow afternoon.

TAX TREATIES

COUNTRIES WITH WHICH CANADA HAS CONCLUDED TREATIES OR CONVENTIONS—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government? Would he inform the Senate with what countries Canada has concluded since 1971—the date of the so-called Tax Reform Act—a tax treaty or convention relating to the avoidance of double taxation or fiscal evasion? Also could he say with what countries negotiations are at present proceeding, and would he also give us a list of the countries with which such treaties or conventions are currently in effect. I use the phrase “tax treaties or conventions” because in the latest release on the subject the heading is “Tax Treaty with France,” which turns out to be in the text a convention. I am not suggesting there is any great difference, but I use the two terms to expedite the leader's answer.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because of the detailed nature of this question, I shall take it as notice and I shall endeavour to provide the information as soon as possible.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 1, the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-367, to amend the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, this is a bill which was introduced in the House of Commons by Mr. John M. Reid, member for Kenora-Rainy River. It is a bill to amend the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act, which provides a bridge between Fort Frances in Canada and International Falls in the United States. This matter has been under discussion between Fort Frances, Ontario and International Falls, Minnesota for many years.

The present bridge was built by the paper company, M&O—or O&M, if you prefer—now owned by Boise Cascade and is for their own purposes between the two mills, one on each side of the Rainy River. A traffic lane was added for cars, but it is not sufficient to take the number of tourists coming into Fort Frances.

Fort Frances is a mill town and an entry to the Rainy River and Lake of the Woods tourist areas. It is situated some 280 miles southeast of Winnipeg. The amount of traffic which passed through there in 1974 is as follows: United States automobiles, 195,219; commercial vehicles, 2,496; other vehicles, 1,494, making a total of 199,209. Canadian traffic during the same year was: automobiles, 134,246; trucks, 7,226; other vehicles, 1,385, making a total of 142,857. The number of United States citizens entering Canada at Fort Frances by automobile was 534,477, and by bus, 7,685, for a total of 542,162. Honourable senators will therefore see the value and necessity of an improved bridge between the two municipalities.

The present bridge is in the downtown area of Fort Frances, and in view of the number of people, trucks and buses passing over it the traffic congestion caused between Fort Frances and International Falls can well be imagined. The new bridge will be financed by tolls, and each country must provide the land for the approaches. This has been done on the Fort Frances side.

This amendment is to provide for the completion of the bridge between December 31, 1975 and December 31, 1979. It is expected that commissioners will be appointed from each country to prepare the plans, build the bridge and operate it.

To my mind, this bridge is a necessity because the congestion on the Fort Frances side is astonishing. The United States has moved its Customs and Immigration offices about 200 or 300 yards from its end of the bridge. A large number of local people are continually passing over it. Of course, it is important to remember that Fort Frances is the port of entry for tourists going to the many fishing and hunting camps around the Rainy River and Lake of the Woods.

I do not think this bill need be referred to committee because it was before the Transport and Communications Committee of the other place on February 20, 1975, when Mr. John Reid, the sponsor, stated that the two purposes of the bill were, first, to complement the omnibus bill which was passed by the United States Congress, applying to all international bridges; and, second, to extend the completion date beyond December 31, 1975. The Government of Canada has supplied vacant land on the Ontario side, about two or three miles north of Fort Frances. This will relieve the congestion on the United States side.

This bridge is in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, for which Mr. Reid is the member. This seat was held by the Honourable Senator Benidickson before he was summoned to the Senate.

I strongly commend this bill to the favourable consideration of the Senate on second reading.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable colleague from Manitoba, Senator Haig, for his comments on the bill. I agree totally with everything he said.

There is a great deal of urgency to proceeding with this matter. It might be asked why it is that we have to have an amendment now to an act that was passed some years ago. It is because of events that occur when dealing with a number of jurisdictions. The construction of this bridge involves two national governments—the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada—the Governments of the States of Minnesota and the Province of Ontario, and the municipal governments of Fort Frances and International Falls.

The need for the bridge is evident. What Senator Haig stated is absolutely accurate. One need only drive through there on a summer weekend to see how urgently needed is the work we are discussing; how urgently this bridge is required.

If there is no disposition to refer the bill to committee—and I do not believe there is any need for that—we can complete second reading now and have third reading when the proper time has elapsed. I support Senator Haig in that regard.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Haig: Next sitting.

Senator Molgat: Next sitting, or if there is any disposition, with leave, now.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the sponsor whether this is a private bill? If it is a private bill, I think it has to go to committee, unless we have changed our rules.

● (2020)

Senator Molgat: The original act, passed on June 30, 1971, was a public act. I would assume that this amending bill with which we are dealing now is a public bill. I am prepared to follow whatever the normal routine is.

Senator Grosart: Read the title of the bill.

Senator Molgat: I am advised that it is in fact a public bill.

Senator Molgat moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT, THE SALARIES ACT AND THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault moved the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act and the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-44 deals with indemnities and allowances for members of both Houses of Parliament. This measure simply gives recognition to the fact that since the allowances and indemnities were last adjusted in October, 1970, there has been a substantial reduction in purchasing power. The $18,000, which was designated as a fair indemnity at that time in terms of purchasing power, has declined something in the order of 38 per cent. This is part of a worldwide phenomenon which has seen the erosion of currencies. Despite the fact that Canada has done better than most nations in the fight against inflation, inflation has affected the allowances and indemnities paid to members of Parliament, whether they serve in the House of Commons or in the Senate.

In addition, the expenses associated with being a member of Parliament have escalated significantly, indeed dramatically. It should be noted that between October 1970 and July 1974, which was the beginning of the present Parliament, the industrial composite index rose by something like 37 per cent. In fact, the increase in the industrial composite index between those dates was somewhat more than 37 per cent, and between July 1974 and the present time, there have been further increases.

There have been many articles written by a good many people about elected officials at all levels of government. I have served in public life now for over 16 years, and I have yet to meet anyone who entered public life in order to become rich and affluent. I am sure all honourable senators, including a number who have served much longer than I, will agree with me. Public life, wherever we serve, requires considerably greater motivation than the motivation of personal aggrandizement.

As I have stated, I know of no person, in my years of service, who has aspired to the goal of becoming wealthy in public life. Indeed, I know of no one who has achieved that goal. I do know of many in public life who have exhausted all their personal resources and have become heavily in debt in the process. They have made sacrifices that are above and beyond the call of duty. Some of the personal sacrifices as far as their families are concerned are beyond description.

Most of those who serve in public life do so because they believe they have a contribution to make to this country. They do not complain about the financial rewards. The fact is that there are intangible rewards that come from public service which only those who serve in Parliament, the legislatures and municipal councils, can have knowledge. Without question, at the present time many parliamentarians are in real financial difficulty. Many of them do not like to admit it; it is a matter of pride to them. You know them and I know them.

The government has decided, in the interests of supporting a policy of restraint, to recommend an upward adjustment of only 33⅓ per cent in indemnities and allowances for the more than four-year period since the last increase, rather than the almost 40 per cent amount supported by the industrial composite index and the cost of living figures. Indeed, one of our colleagues, the Honourable Senator Lawson, recently wrote an excellent essay on the subject, comparing the proposed adjustments in allowances and indemnities paid in Parliament to those in other sectors of our community. I thought it a very excellent effort indeed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: In this bill now before us, Bill C-44, it is proposed that annual adjustments be made on the basis of the intervening changes in the industrial composite index. The first annual adjustment would take place at the beginning of 1976.

Between 1970 and 1974, members of Parliament were probably one of the few sectors in the community to hold the line. I know there are some critics in the other place and some commentators who have said, "Well, the adjustment in late 1970 was designed to hold you over for a few years." That is precisely incorrect. Some honourable senators will recall the debate of that year, in which the 1970 adjustment was to make up for the period 1962 to 1970—and not to extend into the future.

The current one-third increase, representing a catch-up over a five-year period, constitutes one of the most moderate adjustments to be found anywhere in the country. I must say, honourable senators, that when I read the comments of some of our friends in the media, who have written of "parliamentary greed," I can only remind them that during the comparable 1970-75 period the street price of some of Canada's newspapers has increased by 100 per cent. And subscription rates have skyrocketed by far more than the one-third increase proposed for members of Parliament.

The last increase members received was in 1971 and related back to 1970. It was designed to cover the period 1962 to 1970. During that time members of Parliament denied themselves any further increases. The 1971 increase was 50 per cent, yet increases in many other categories of service during the comparable period went substantially beyond that. For example, many newspaper reporters and editorial writers on the West Coast received a 58 per cent increase during the same 1962-1971 period. And if members of Parliament had proposed for themselves the same percentage increase as that negotiated by members of the West Coast journalistic profession between 1971 and 1975, they would have been asking for a 70.5 per cent increase.

I mention these figures facetiously because, after all, perhaps it is unfair to compare the situation of members of Parliament with that of people in television, radio and the news media generally. As public servants we have our own standards to establish, and our own responsibilities. I do not want in any way to reflect on the hard-working members of the press gallery, because I do not think anyone resents what they receive. But I want to remind them that the increases sought by members of Parliament are not inordinate, and they are not out of line.

The question is often raised: When is it a good time to increase indemnities? I have been in public office for some time, and I know the honourable Leader of the Opposition has as well. I am aware that many of you have served in this place for many years. The answer to the question is that there is never a good time to raise indemnities. One of the most difficult tasks confronting those in public life is to establish a level of indemnities which will enable those of even moderate means to serve in Parliament. Surely we do not want a situation where only those people with substantial private means can afford to serve in Parliament. That would not be the kind of representative body we require here. Surely, we do not want only those people to serve in Parliament who have been able to divest themselves of all financial responsibilities in that their youngsters have grown up and are now in the workaday world.

Honourable senators, the bill before us provides that at the beginning of the next Parliament the Governor in Council shall appoint commissioners to inquire into the adequacy of the annual variations of sessional allowances payable to members. That, I think, is substantial progress. The agonizing, periodic process which occupies so much of Parliament's time and public attention is a difficult experience for everyone. Hence the proposal to appoint these commissioners at the commencement of each new Parliament to inquire into the adequacy of the annual variations in sessional allowances payable. The commissioners are to report to the Governor in Council within six months of their appointment, and the report is to be laid before Parliament.

In Bill C-44, honourable senators, you will note that the proposed increase on the expense side, from $4,000 to $5,300 for senators, representing a one-third increase, is considerably less than the increase for the members of the House of Commons. I think you will agree that this is as it should be in view of the generally higher expenses of members of the other place. It must be acknowledged that in many cases the constituency responsibilities of members of the other house result in substantially greater financial demands.

However, let me say at this time that there has been a regrettable lack of understanding about that which constitutes so-called tax-free allowances. That term is bandied about quite a bit these days. You and I know that in every business and profession there is a range of expenses which are not entered as income on any tax return. For example, those in business have legitimate entertainment expenses in connection with their activities which are not taxable. For example, on occasion members of the press take members of Parliament out to lunch. That has been known to happen! I know our friends in the press gallery do not regard entertainment lunch money as any great tax-free "plum" which they should show as a benefit at the end of the tax year. Nor should any of those in business have to pay out of their own pockets for taxi rides, hotels and those journeys which must be taken as part of their official, professional responsibilities.

Honourable senators, I think it is rather paradoxical that in their negotiations with their employers, all of the professions, those in the great trade union movement, do not include any of these items as being equivalent to tax-free income. Yet we continue to hear the complaint that members of Parliament get big, rich "tax-free" income while the rest of Canadians have to pay taxes. This tax-free income is supposed to represent a "special privilege." Well, they have not seen the parliamentarians up in the dining room at noon treating large groups of visiting people from back home to lunch, otherwise they would have some idea of where the "tax-free" allowances go—this, and toward maintaining two residences.

There are those in public life who are bewildered by the lack of appreciation of the situation facing members of Parliament who, in their own way, are required to expend a great deal of money on expenses. For some reason this expense money is, as I have said, inevitably described as a tax-free allowance—a "bonus" on top of everything else. And I read an article over the weekend by one of the respected journalists in this nation, who reported dramatically to his readers that, in addition to the substantial increase in so-called "tax-free allowances," a member of Parliament receives 52—count them—52 free trips a year aboard Canada's air lines. Indeed, you know, for those members of Parliament, particularly those who live in the extremities of the country, a free trip to work once a week from back home to Ottawa does not have that much fascination. A free trip to work, leaving the family, on the Sunday night "midnight coronary special" from British Columbia back to Ottawa, is not really something you would put in the luxury category. Frankly, it may be said, "Thank God that we have men and women willing to make this kind of sacrifice in order to achieve something worthwhile for Canada."

During my public life I have served both in a provincial legislature and in Parliament. As other honourable senators who have had the same experience will agree, the provincial sessions are substantially shorter than the year-round schedule we are on in Ottawa. Nevertheless, since 1970 every provincial legislature has increased its indemnity levels, and some of them are substantially more attractive than parliamentary indemnities. For example, in my home province of British Columbia, where we have a government of a well-known political persuasion, one of the first bills introduced allowed the Premier of British Columbia to increase his personal indemnity well beyond that paid to the Prime Minister of Canada. He said that the working people of British Columbia did not want him to go second-class.

His second move—and I believe my honourable colleague from British Columbia, Senator Lawson, described this in one of his articles—was to increase indemnities for his backbenchers to $16,000 a year taxable and $8,000 tax-free expense money over a ten-week session. In addition to that, certain committee work was to be covered at the rate of $50 a day, and I understand they are talking about increases.

The fact is that while most MLAs across this country work diligently, I think nothing really compares in public life with the schedule of those who work in Parliament. That fact should be reiterated and restated time and again, because the fact is not always appreciated by those who write news for the people of this country.

And it may be interesting to compare Parliament, which in fact is the citizens' highest court, with the Public Service. There are something like 25,000 federal public servants today receiving more remuneration than members of the House of Commons, and a substantially greater number than that receive more than those who serve here in this place.

The bill before us has been modified and amended in line with representations made in the other place, and I do not believe that we are in a position at this stage usefully to begin the process anew. I do welcome the measures which are included in the legislation to improve the position of our good friends in Opposition in this place. They have a difficult task, and I think we all share the view that our parliamentary system works much better with a vigorous, alert and determined Opposition.

As honourable senators are aware, Bill C-44 has enjoyed the overwhelming support of both Government members and members of the Official Opposition in the other place and, indeed, at least some support on the part of the minority parties. In fact, there has been support in the other place from representatives of all parties.

I would just like to review the salient facts again. The bill, in its original form, called for indemnities and allowances that were somewhat higher than those in the measure before us. You will recall the great dispute about the 50 per cent. Owing to serious misunderstandings in some quarters as to the true nature of the increase, in that it was to cover a period of eight years, representing in fact an increase well within all the established guidelines, parliamentarians have evolved a different method of remuneration, which is to be found in this bill. The different method adopted in the present bill calls for an increase as of the beginning of this Parliament of 33½ per cent above the prevailing indemnities and allowances. Again, this increase is several percentage points lower than the increase in the industrial composite index, from the effective date of the last adjustment until the beginning of this Parliament. Thereafter, beginning in 1976, the bill calls for an annual adjustment in indemnities and allowances in accordance with the percentage change in the industrial composite index between the two preceding years, subject, however, to a maximum increase in any year of 7 per cent.

I have described the proposal to have a commission to review the entire range of indemnities at the commencement of the next Parliament.

This measure, in its present form, represents an equitable solution, and a solution which is the result of a great deal of discussion. It is a solution as satisfactory as we are likely to get at the present time. It is a measure which will provide at least some relief for members of Parliament, many of whom are experiencing great economic difficulties.

Honourable senators, I commend this measure to you, and I hope you will give it your support.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments in support of this legislation, and to make a few constructive criticisms.

I recall participating in a similar debate in 1970 in this chamber, and offering the advice to the government that they should find a different method of dealing with wage increases for members of both houses and members of the judiciary. The government obviously was not impressed by that advice, because they totally rejected it, and I have the scars to prove it. I think perhaps they should have the minister responsible for introducing the bill in the other chamber spend a short semester in some of the union halls, or in the boardrooms with management, learning how to negotiate.

I wrote an article on this subject, because I was troubled somewhat by a series of editorials that I read which said things like, "too sordid for belief," and "the increase was too outrageous to be believed." They talked about the venality of politicians; they accused us of being wickedly irresponsible, and said that it was a self-seeking raid on the treasury.

In reading all of the articles across the country that I have had the opportunity to see, I found, no matter how I searched, that I could not find one expressing the other point of view. I therefore wrote my article, and I called up the publishers of that great newspaper, the Vancouver Sun, and said, "Perhaps, as a refreshing experience for your newspaper, you will print the other side of the argument." To my surprise, they agreed. It was suggested by some of the newspaper types that I wrote the article out of a sense of guilt, and that is true. I did it out of a sense of guilt but not, as they suspected, a sense of guilt arising from a feeling that we were receiving too much, but a sense of guilt that as a union representative I was responsible each week of the year for negotiating large increases for many sections of society while idly watching people on fixed incomes, such as judges, and members of the other house and of this house, not receiving any increase. It was indeed a sense of guilt.

I was accused of being opposed to senior citizens and their rights by supporting the legislation. Let me say at the outset, however, and set the record straight, that that was a vicious attack by some of the newspapers and their columnists, because I said that the increases for senior citizens were not relevant to this debate. So that there is no misunderstanding, let me say that I am prepared, as at least one member of this house, to support a 50 per cent increase to senior citizens. I am prepared to take off the top of the gross national product whatever is necessary to give senior citizens a decent standard of living. But that still has nothing whatever to do with the issue we are talking about in this legislation.

I did some research among material that was readily available to me, since I was responsible in many ways for the increases I am about to mention, and took some categories of workers at random. I took, for example, the woodworkers, because they represent 50 per cent of the economy of British Columbia. In a four-year period they had not received a 50 per cent increase; they had only received 49.8 per cent, and they are back in negotiations now.

I took plumbers, to see what they had done. In the five-year period, including 1975, they received 56.8 per cent.

I took teachers, because I did not want to single out the trades for comment. Teachers received 63.9 per cent, including a very handsome 16.5 per cent for the year 1975.

I took the labourers—and it was suggested to me that that was a fair comparison with us—and noted that they had received 88.7 per cent, which included 15.2 per cent for 1975.

Of course, the cause of all these nasty and vicious editorials are the journalists and newsmen. I thought, "Let us see what they have done." I recall vividly that in the previous nine years, when we received an increase of 50 per cent, they received 68 per cent. On this occasion, for the years 1971 to 1975 inclusive, they received an increase of only 70.4 per cent, and are presently enjoying, in the year 1975, a very handsome increase of 17.5 per cent. I do not begrudge newsmen, or all these other classifications of people, those kinds of increases.

It should also be pointed out, however, that in each of those years they received retroactive pay. They received a benefit in each year, and that applies to any classification you want to name. The newsmen already have in their hip pockets a cash increase of $12,678. The labourers have already received the benefit of $15,977; the plumbers have only received $10,216; teachers have only received $11,511. This is money they receive each year to offset inflation and the high cost of living. This is money they have had in their pockets to invest or spend, or otherwise benefit from.

No such provision is contained in this bill except, as I understand it, that making the increase retroactive to the beginning of this Parliament.

So, while I do not begrudge any of these groups those very healthy increases, I really think that the rule of clean hands applies, and that journalists and editorialists have just as much responsibility in their field as we have in ours. They have a duty to say, "While we are attacking the government and members of both houses for this very large and exorbitant increase—which has now been reduced to 33½ per cent—we have only had the benefit of a 70 per cent increase ourselves." I think that instead of being on the defensive—and we have to assume some of the responsibility for being in this box—we should take the offensive and say to the Canadian public at large, "Yes, you are paying a fair wage, but you will be getting a good return on your investment, the investment you are making in the sacrifice of your public servants."

It is becoming even more difficult in British Columbia. The Leader of the Government pointed out some of the things that are taking place in that province. It is becoming difficult for industry and unions with their representatives to compete with the salaries paid by the provincial government. In this article I prepared I have some of them: Commissioners, $34,000; Compensation Board, $39,000; Associate Deputy Ministers, $33,000; Labour Relations Board Deputy Minister, $43,000, and so on. To my chagrin, the day the article came out it was obsolete because the provincial government raised all categories by an additional $5,000.

But the thing that really troubles me about that is that at no time while this provincial government, this NDP government, was putting in these increases—and I do not begrudge them; I am not opposed to them—I did not hear one word of protest from the members opposing it in the other house. There was not a single word; there was absolute silence at raising the Premier of British Columbia to a higher scale than that of the Prime Minister of Canada. There was no protest against doubling the increases for members of the provincial house, and there was no protest against raising these various civil servants to an average of about $40,000 a year. There was not one word of protest. Now if they want to oppose this increase on its merits, and if they are opposed to it, then all I can say is that they are truly the best judges of their own worth.

Honourable senators, I think we have an obligation to speak out. The Leader of the Government talked about the civil servants who are being paid well, but he failed to mention that there are more than 1,000 civil servants in this city alone earning in excess of $60,000 a year. There is no word of protest about that, and it is more than double what is being paid to members of either house.

I think we should also put an end to the very invalid argument that Senator Perrault mentioned about the question of expenses, but again we will read tomorrow in every newspaper across the country articles relating and tying the expenses to our salaries. Coming from British Columbia, I know of no member of either house who is not spending 100 per cent of his expenses and more. I know of nobody in private industry or among union representatives who are getting only $4,000 or $8,000 tax free. The average in my office for representatives is $15,000 a year tax free. We do not tally this as part of their salary; it relates to fares and travelling. Yes, we get 52 trips per year and 10 to other parts of the country, and there is some criticism because you are allowed to bring your spouse six times a year to Ottawa. I think that was occasioned when they allowed conjugal visits for prisoners once a week and they thought the senators could handle it six times a year.

I read an article last week which said that members of the Senate are going to get this substantial salary for working seven hours a day. Well, when Senator Perrault and I put in seven hours, we have not yet reached the Chamber. We are still on our way to the airport because, like our good friend from New Brunswick, we do not have a direct flight either. So, honourable senators, I think that at every opportunity we should point out, loud and clear, some of these issues.

I have also read criticisms about the parliamentary restaurant. I had dinner with some of our labour friends who were here from Whitehorse, trying to get a preview of what is going to happen when they get a member in the Senate. While we had dinner we talked about the low rate that one has to pay there. It is really a matter of comparison. When somebody asks, "How is your wife?" the reply is, "Compared to whose?" We pay $2 for a meal, but when I worked on construction I got free room and board and did not pay anything. And this happens with most tradesmen across the country.

I do not mind honest and objective criticism, but surely we are entitled to demand of our friends in the press that it be honest and fair criticism.

What is happening with increases in wage negotiations? I am not even too proud to report it because the average increase in Canada for the last quarter of 1974 was 19.4 per cent. The average of the settlements made in the first quarter of this year, 1975, has been 15 per cent. So, while there is concern, and while there will be criticism levelled by the press at this increase over a four-year period of 33½ per cent, most organized unions will have received in the year 1974-1975 at least 34 or 35 per cent. A settlement was negotiated on Monday—Senator Perrault may be interested to know this—in Surrey after a strike of six or eight weeks. The union accepted the argument of the municipality that they could not afford any more, and so they accepted a "cheap deal" of 35 per cent plus a cost of living increase for two years.

Surely in the face of that—and I think there is a need, as a separate subject, for trade unions to concern themselves about these high increases—there is a need to concern ourselves with what is happening to less fortunate groups who do not have these recovery powers. When that is measured and compared with what is happening to people on fixed incomes in this chamber and in the House of Commons, and judges, I think we can stand any kind of scrutiny, as a fair comparison shows that no one here is being overpaid.

Speaking of the judges, I do not know when amendments to the Judges Act are coming in, but I hope that the government is going to introduce them quickly. While there are members of both houses, as Senator Perrault pointed out, who do not want to admit, out of a sense of pride, that they cannot afford to continue to function, there are members of the bench who are in desperate straits and who need those increases. I do not think it is good enough for us as citizens of Canada to demand from our best legal brains in the country tremendous sacrifice and a tremendous workload, and then say, "However, you understand, we don't make any adjustments if we don't pay you as well as a plumber or a labourer, and we cannot give you a decent salary." We must recognize that most judges are on the bench during their peak earning years, and are making a sacrifice of at least two or three times the salary they receive, which they are contributing to the people of Canada whom they serve. I do not think it is good enough for the people of Canada to expect that kind of sacrifice by way of talent, family, and so on, from judges, and from members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate, and also expect those people to work for less than the average scale.

Honourable senators, I am not going to propose any amendments or attempt to impede the progress of the bill, but I think the government made a mistake in not putting in at least 37.1 per cent, which would do nothing more than restore us to the 1970 purchasing power. But the decision has been made, and they have at least now provided a formula which is going to improve the situation in the future, and I hope they will move speedily on the Judges Act. I think we should be simply saying, loud and clear, that the people of Canada are well served by their members in both houses at considerable sacrifice, and they are getting an excellent return on their investment.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Harry Hays moved the second reading of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

He said: Honourable senators, this is intended to provide various mechanisms for the better governance of the oil industry in Canada. It is in some respects a successor to Bill C-18, which died on the Order Paper with the dissolution of Parliament on May 8 last year. In some other respects it contains additional features which take account of changing circumstances and developments in international and domestic trade in oil and gas. The changes and stresses which have occurred in the international oil industry since the fall of 1973 are matters of common knowledge. They have seriously challenged the economic base of the world's trading community. Canada has participated in a response at the international level, as indicated by the agreement on an international energy program.

Because of its geographical and geological good fortune, Canada has been less seriously affected than a number of other countries. We are nonetheless affected by the change in the world situation, and we wish to play a constructive role as a member of the international community while at the same time taking action to protect ourselves as Canadians.

I have referred to the international action being taken. In the bill before us this evening we are dealing with domestic action contemplated to protect ourselves in this new situation. Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act, is intended to provide the federal government with a statutory basis for the management necessary in the interests of all Canadians of important areas of international and interprovincial trade in petroleum and natural gas. Enactment of the legislation is essential if the government is to guide the Canadian energy economy safely in the present turbulent global environment.

The bill before us is lengthy and is complex in parts. However, honourable senators will perhaps be familiar with many of the aims and much of the content of the measure. The portions of the bill dealing with (a) petroleum export charges; (b) domestic oil price restraint; and, (c) petroleum import cost compensation, are essentially unchanged from the corresponding parts contained in Bill C-18 which was introduced to the last Parliament in April of last year. A new part deals with natural gas. The objective of this part is to provide for that commodity a regime similar to that proposed for oil. The intention is to provide an equitable pricing regime for Canadians in both producing and consuming provinces. In addition, this part looks to an eventual equalization of commodity value between natural gas and other fuels.

The bill is in five parts and I will attempt to explain it by these parts. Part I deals with petroleum export charges. This part of the bill is intended to replace the Oil Export Tax Act, 1974, by which Part III.1 was added to the Excise Tax Act.

It had been intended during the last session of Parliament that Bill C-18 would replace the Oil Export Tax Act. With the death of Bill C-18 on the dissolution of Parliament, industry was asked to continue paying the "charge" on a voluntary basis by a telex of May 9, 1974, from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Industry has complied with that request. The rates of "voluntary charge" were recommended and the charge collected by the National Energy Board. Instead of the flat rate imposed by the Oil Export Tax Act on all oil grades exported, different rates were set selectively on varying kinds of product.

The "voluntary charge" and the selective rates on product kinds are established by clause 6, and implemented with retroactive effect by clause 95.

The administration of the charge, and the duty of advising the minister on the amount for a given month, rests with the National Energy Board. The minister is then empowered to apply his own judgment following which he recommends the tariff to the Governor in Council. The charge is payable by the person under whose export licence the export is made. This is exactly as under the Excise Tax Act, Part III.1, and the Oil Export Tax Act. If there is no "exporter" the charge is nevertheless payable by a person who in fact exports oil.

The minister responsible for administering Bill C-32 is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to whom the export charge is payable, although it is provided that the National Energy Board shall administer Part I and collect on behalf of the minister the export charges.

Clause 12 provides for exemption or reduction of the export charge, much along the lines of section 17 of the Financial Administration Act, which provides for remission of taxes. There are penalties for default.

Part II of the bill is designed to implement certain stated aims of the government's oil and gas policy. A central feature of our oil and energy policy relates to the pricing of domestic crude oil. The government's declared policy is that domestic oil prices should reach but not exceed the level required to bring forward an adequate supply for Canadian requirements. Part II is intended to achieve, so far as is practicable, a uniform price, exclusive of transportation costs, for crude oil used in Canada outside its province of production; to achieve a balance in Canada between interests of consumers and producers; and finally to protect Canadian consumers from instability of pricing in the international petroleum market.

Part II is divided into two sections: Division I, Price Restraint; Division II, Additional Price Restraint. Division I aims to achieve the objectives of Part II by agreement between the federal government and the governments of producing provinces. When an agreement has been reached the Governor in Council may issue regulations establishing maximum prices for the various qualities and kinds of crude oil to which the division applies. There are administrative provisions for giving effect to the price restraint imposed by the regulations of the Governor in Council.

Division II provides a second stage mechanism to be used to achieve many of the objectives of Part II, when the federal-provincial agreements provided for in Division I are not reached, are terminated, or prove ineffective.

Division II, in such an event, takes to the federal government power to administer interprovincial trade in crude oil, and to regulate the prices at which such trade is carried on. Division II comes into effect on a date to be fixed by proclamation, and the Governor in Council may direct that the National Energy Board assume supervision and regulation of the movement of crude oil out of an exporting province. The proclamation is subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons, according to procedures detailed in the bill. Two days of debate are provided for. This is one of the last amendments.

The part provides for a system of licences, and no one but a licensee may carry out certain interprovincial transactions. Intraprovincial transactions may be carried on by a non-licensee, thus avoiding a challengeable interference by the federal power in matters under provincial jurisdiction.

As in Division I, there are provisions for offence and punishment.

Part III of the bill is the new section I referred to earlier. It is intended to achieve for Canadian source gas in interprovincial trade the same results as are intended by Part II for oil; that is, to achieve a uniform price, exclusive of transportation and service costs, for gas used outside its province of production; balance the interests of consumers and producers; protect consumers from instability of prices for gas, and also preserve a reasonable balance between the prices of alternative fuels in Canada. These last words open the door to commodity value pricing of gas.

The basic mechanism is similar to that of Part II, but it is simpler in application. Whereas Part II is split into Divisions I and II which deal respectively with the "federal-provincial agreement" and the "exercise of sole federal power" bases, Part II achieves similar results without the licensing scheme required by Part II, Division II. This is because of the different natures of the two industries. Since the pipeline companies in the case of gas are purchasers, not merely carriers, it is much simpler to police the interprovincial transactions.

Part IV, dealing with cost compensation, is intended to fit imported oil and product into the same uniform price policy as is to be achieved in the case of domestic crude by Part II.

The price of overseas crude is higher than that of domestic, but oil companies' market recovery is limited on a "voluntary" basis at levels suggested from time to time in a manner to be prescribed by regulations. To date, in the absence of a statutory base, the manner has been that of guidelines issued by the minister. To compensate the companies for the difference between their high overseas costs and their limited domestic market recovery, compensation is payable.

Part IV provides that the detailed elements of compensation will be specified in regulations to be made by the Governor in Council and administered by the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. A periodic parliamentary check will be available since the funding will be by budgetary appropriation.

There is provision in Part IV, Division II, for compensation in certain abnormal circumstances, for transportation cost increases incurred in moving crude and allied products from points in Canada to other points in Canada. This may be of great value in an emergency, when it is necessary to move western crude to eastern refineries, or eastern product to western markets, without disturbing the "single oil pricing policy." Such a scheme will come into effect only temporarily, and only on the direction of the Governor in Council.

The act provides in many places for the exercise of judgment, for the exercise of which detailed information on various aspects of the oil industry is necessary. The information required to base the price maxima which may be fixed pursuant to the bill calls for detailed information on prices, quantities, qualities of crude oil and products, and geographical markets. The whole of Part IV, which provides for the disbursement of parliamentary moneys to eligible members of the oil industry, requires of the minister and the persons exercising the discretion and authorizing payments that they be well informed. Part V provides, subject to certain limitations as to confidentiality, that all necessary information will be made available to the minister.

Honourable senators, I have tried to explain, as well as I could, the purpose of this very complex and detailed bill, which I recommend to you. I hope that we see fit to send it to committee where honourable senators may ask questions of officials on some of the detailed aspects of the bill.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

FARM CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on Bill C-34, to amend the Farm Credit Act, which was presented Thursday, May 1, 1975.

Hon. Hazen Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, in its report, has proposed an amendment to the bill and has made two recommendations. The reasoning behind the recommendations is set forth in the committee's report.

The proposed amendment would make a larger loan available to persons up to the age of 40 years rather than 35 years, as provided in the bill that came to us from the other house. The majority of committee members felt that with respect to loans for young farmers, the maximum of which is $150,000, the cut-off age of 35 was too low. They felt that many farmers over that age might be in need of such a loan and should be eligible to receive it. The committee amended the bill accordingly, substituting 40 for 35 where applicable. In my opinion, this is a modest amendment.

Under Part III of the Farm Credit Act there has long been a provision for supervised farm loans for persons under the age of 45 years. Under this provision it has been possible for persons who have not attained the age of 45 years to borrow up to 75 per cent of the appraised value of his farm. The legislation would be more consistent if a higher age limit were adopted.

Honourable senators, with this brief explanation I would recommend the adoption of this report.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, as a member of the Agriculture Committee I attended the various meetings during which this bill was considered. I listened to the arguments presented in support of amending the upper age limit for the maximum loan from 35 to 40. I cannot in all conscience support this amendment.

One of the main purposes of Bill C-34 is to attract more young people into our agricultural economy. I do not know at what age a person is no longer young, but it seems to me that no matter what age limit is set, whether it is 35, 40, or any other age, it is an arbitrary decision.

It is my feeling that a person ought to have accomplished something by the time he reaches 35 years of age. He should have accumulated some assets which stand him in better stead for the purposes of obtaining financing than would be the case with a younger person.

This legislation does not say that you have to be under 35 years of age or, if the amendment passes, under 40 years of age, in order to obtain a loan. As the bill is presently drafted, those under the age of 35 years can borrow up to a maximum of $150,000, whereas those over 35 years of age will be limited to a maximum of $100,000. In other words, the government is telling our young people that they are entitled to a little additional support as opposed to those who are a bit older and who have had an opportunity to build up greater assets.

If I were disposed to an amendment, it would be to lower the age to 30. I sincerely believe that unless we are able to attract many young people into the agricultural economy, the future of farming in this nation is bleak. I think all honourable senators would agree that the average age of farmers across Canada today is much too high. If we provide the same benefits under this legislation to people aged 40 or more years, as are provided to the young farmer, then we are losing one of the main imports of the legislation.

I ask for the support of honourable senators on this occasion to defeat the proposed amendment. In my view, to raise the upper limit to 40 years of age defeats one of the main purposes of the bill, that being to attract young people into the farming community. Many of them, of course, will not borrow the maximum of $150,000. Some will have to start much below that. As a matter of fact, the average loan under the act as it presently stands is much below the maximum.

I ask honourable senators to consider what I have said, and to consider the reasonableness of giving younger people a little more help, a little more assistance, than is provided to those who should have accumulated some assets. I ask honourable senators to show our young people that we are prepared to give them a little more assistance than we are prepared to give to those who have been in farming longer than they have, or to those who have accumulated assets outside the agricultural industry and are changing their occupations. They, too, need assistance. However, they will be able to borrow up to $100,000. The young man or woman beginning farming at a very young age, even in his or her twenties, surely is entitled to a few dollars more than the individual who is 40 years of age or older.

I ask honourable senators to support the bill as it is presently drafted.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, I rise to support the amendment proposed by the committee. I have nothing whatsoever against young people getting the largest amount possible, but at the same time I do not think those over 35 years of age, especially those in the 35 to 40 age group, should be excluded. I do not think Senator McDonald's argument that by 35 years of age they should have amassed a fortune in farming is valid.

Senator McDonald: I did not say that.

Senator Norrie: Obviously Senator McDonald does not come from the Maritimes where we have to struggle for every penny. It is quite different on the large farms in Western Canada, but farmers in the Maritimes need more help than do the farmers of Western Canada.

A man of 35 years who has been in farming has, by that point in his life, developed an expertise, and he would not want to continue in farming at that age unless he loved it.

The agricultural representatives who process applications for loans under this act are not going to make loans to people who are not responsible and not capable of using the moneys advanced wisely. They know how to assess what a man is worth. I have myself been before them, and I know. They are very clever about it. They know what a man is worth.

In terms of setting up a farming operation, $150,000 is almost peanuts. Senator McDonald, I am sure, is aware of what combines cost, whether they are for potatoes or wheat. Tractors, too, cost a great deal of money, as does livestock.

Moneys advanced under this loan program can be used for the accumulation of acreage, buildings, livestock, and so forth. It seems that farms in the Maritimes require more buildings than do farms in Western Canada. I do not know why that is. In terms of acquiring stock, $200,000 does not go all that far. It is spent before you can turn around.

It really depends on the kind of farming you go into. If an individual is going into potato farming, he needs $200,000. If he is going into mixed farming, I do not think the investment is quite as heavy. I think the maximum loan should be available to all applicants; not just a streamlined group of people under the age of 35 years.

This amendment does not change the amount of money involved. It would simply make the amount of money involved available to those in a different age group. It is not outside the competence of the Senate to pass this amendment. It does not increase the amount of money involved, but simply increases the upper age limit to 40 for those persons who would be eligible for the maximum loan of $150,000. Under the bill as it is presently drafted, the maximum would be available to those in the 18 to 35 age group, and the amendment would make it available to those in the 18 to 40 age group.

Senator McDonald: No, no.

Senator Norrie: Yes. This bill, if passed, will provide loans to young farmers.

Senator McDonald: Yes, but the credit will not be cut off at age 40. Those over the age of 35 or, if the amendment is passed, those over the age of 40, will still be eligible for loans up to $100,000.

● (2130)

Senator Norrie: It cuts off the amount.

Senator McDonald: That is right.

Senator Norrie: I feel that it is within the competence of the Senate to deal with the bill in this way. Changing the age limit does not, I think, involve any more money; it is really just using it in a slightly different way.

That is all I have to say, honourable senators. I contend that we need this change.

Senator McDonald: I did not want to interrupt the honourable senator while she was speaking. She did say I had commented that people at a certain age should have amassed a fortune. I said no such thing. If I might repeat what I said, I do think that by the time people are 30, 35 or 40 they ought to have amassed some assets. Certainly in 99.9 per cent of the cases they will not have amassed a fortune, but they will have amassed some assets compared with a young person leaving school or university who begins with nothing, and who could not be expected to have anything when embarking on his first working activities in life.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, I attended the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture at which it was recommended that the age limit for loans up to $150,000 be increased from 35 to 40. I agree with Senator Norrie and the committee. It is said that on the average farmers in Canada are getting older. I do not think this pattern has changed much over the years.

I have before me a statistical handbook issued by the Canadian grains industry in 1974. Although it is not up to date in its information on the ages of all farmers, it gives for each province and for Canada the ages of farmers from 1931 to 1971, which includes the years of the depression, the war years and the fifties and sixties. It pretty well rounds out our good and bad times. From this it can be seen that in 1971, in the 35 to 44 years age group there were 83,431 farmers; in the age group 34 years and under there were 55,535; and in the age group from 45 to 54 years there were 106,468. According to age group, the Canadian farmer is no different from a member of any other industry or profession. In the legal profession, the medical profession, and in business as a whole, it will be found that the great producers in Canada are in the age group between 35 and 55 years. They support nearly everybody by their efforts.

As I think Senator Norrie explained so well, $200,000 for a farm in any part of Canada is not all that large an investment. In Saskatchewan the size of the average farm today is 813 acres. For a good viable farm, according to what the committee was told in answer to a question I asked the other day, the cost of land is in the neighbourhood of between $250 and $300 an acre. We are looking at $240,000 for an average farm in Saskatchewan, with no machinery and no livestock.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask the honourable senator a question? When you quote that price per acre, is that for average land in Saskatchewan or the best land in Saskatchewan, according to the evidence given before the committee?

Senator Hays: If you are going to practise law, teach or be in the Senate, the best place to be is where the action is. Anybody who buys poor land will be in trouble, and $50,000 will not help him today. I believe we have to deal with the progressive person; we must have legislation to help the viable farmer.

We have a responsibility to the consumers of this country, and we do not think enough of our responsibility to consumers when we discuss this type of legislation. Canadians eat cheaper than any other people in the developed countries of the world—20 per cent of their take-home pay is used for food. In Israel as much as 48 per cent is used for food; in some countries it is as much as 60 per cent, while in others it is as high as 80 per cent. Our farmers do a great job for Canadians. If our people can eat cheaper their productivity is higher, and Canada is better equipped to export. We are one of the largest food exporting countries in the world, and if we are to stay in that position we must keep these farms viable.

[Senator Norrie.]

I do not know why it should be thought there is anything sacred about the age of 35, 38, 40 or 45 years. When I was responsible for the Farm Credit Corporation I thought they should take the lid off it; that money should be loaned on the ability of the man to pay it back. That is the way everything else is done.

I know of three young fellows in their early forties who have just bought a farm, in addition to a 5,000-acre farm they already had. They paid $1,800,000 for it, and the Royal Bank of Canada, I think it was, saw fit to lend them a large piece of that money. That is the sort of confidence they put in these three young farmers.

Many young people today do not leave university until they are 25, 26 or 27 years of age. Just try to accumulate $50,000 or $100,000 between the ages of 27 to 35. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture suggested that the amount should be raised to $250,000. The federation, representing all the farmers in Canada, suggested that not enough was being done in this legislation. Let it be remembered that the government borrows money more cheaply than many institutions.

If the government can assist the farmer without subsidizing him, charging their one per cent interest for handling and making it flexible, it seems to me this is the type of legislation we should be aiming at. I think it would be very sad if this evening the Senate saw fit to stay with the 35 age limit suggested in the bill, and I support the report of the committee.

Senator Burchill: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Did the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in their brief make any comment on age?

Senator Hays: No, I do not think they made any comment on age.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to make a short contribution to this debate, because when the bill was before us on second reading I questioned the chairman of the committee about raising the age limit.

I am well aware of the reluctance of the government to change the age regulations. According to my information, such an amendment was proposed in the other place and rejected, but that still does not affect my concern over the fact that there are a large number of potential farmers in the age bracket of 35 to 40 who could be put back on the land. I think this is what we are talking about. We are looking at that arbitrary figure. I must say, I was impressed by the speech of Senator Hays, as always, speaking from his vast knowledge of the agricultural industry.

The age could be 30, 35 or 40 years. From my reading, I understand that part of the reason for making the age 35 is the risk that may be involved in the paying back of the money borrowed. In other words, if you are too old when you borrow, you may not have enough time left to pay back to the government the principal and interest—in spite of the fact, Senator McDonald, that in Saskatchewan a farmer is likely to live longer than anywhere else in Canada.

I should like to refer, without quoting it, to some of the evidence given in committee of the other place. Dr. M. G. B. Kristjanson, Chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation, indicated that there is nothing wrong actuarially with raising the age limit to 40. He said there would be no problem, that there was really no reason why a man of 40 years of age would not be as good a risk as a man of 35. That was his response to the concern of actuarial risk in the pay-back.

In my opinion, this country sorely needs the substantial pool of potential farmers which exists today. There are many former farmers or farmers' sons and daughters who left the land years ago. They were raised on the farm. They went to school. There was probably not sufficient farmland for them to stay on the farm, or other members of their families took the farm on. These people are to be found in towns and cities throughout the country. They may have made their way, but there are many of them who would like to return to farming. Such people may well be over 35 years of age, and I suggest that it would be wrong not to give them full encouragement.

I am well aware that the difference is a mere $50,000; that up to age 60 it is possible to receive $100,000. But that $50,000 reduction owing to the age difference can be the crucial factor in enabling a person to get back on the land.

Certainly we have heard of the high costs of getting into farming and of expanding farming; nevertheless, we need these people, both from the point of view of the economy and from the point of view of our consumers.

With these thoughts in mind, and realizing full well the likelihood of the government's rejecting this particular proposal, I am nevertheless prepared to support the amendment proposed by our Standing Committee on Agriculture.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

MULTICULTURALISM

MINISTRY OF STATE—ORGANIZATION AND BUDGET—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon I gave a commitment to honourable senators, and particularly to Senator Yuzyk, to provide certain information with respect to questions posed by him on Wednesday, March 26. I now have that information, and with the indulgence of the Senate I shall provide it in as brief a form as possible.

The Honourable Senator Yuzyk's first question was:

I. A Ministry of State responsible for Multiculturalism was established in November 1972, which lasted until the fall of 1974 as a separate ministry.

(a) What was the budget allocated to this ministry for the purposes of multicultural programs and projects and how much was spent under Dr. Stanley Haidasz?

(b) Did the minister have a separate departmental budget and, if so, what was its size and how was it spent?

The answer to question I.(a) is:

(a) Although a Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism was appointed in November 1972, the policy as such was announced by the Prime Minister on October 8, 1971, with a special grants budget. Annual estimates for the Department of the Secretary of State and Cultural Agencies were as follows:

|---------|-------------|
| 1971/72 | $910,000 |
| 1972/73 | $2,522,000 |
| 1973/74 | $7,948,000 |
| 1974/75 | $7,780,000 |

The answer to question I.(b) is:

(b) No. However, it should be noted that this allotment is part of the operations of the Department of the Secretary of State, more specifically of the Citizenship Branch, of which the Multicultural Program is an integral part, and of federal agencies, Public Archives, National Library, Museum of Man, National Film Board and the CRTC.

The second question posed by Honourable Senator Yuzyk was this:

II. Subsequently, the Honourable John Munro, Minister of Labour, was assigned also the portfolio of Multiculturalism.

(a) Does he have a separate department and a budget for multiculturalism?

The answer is:

(a) No. The Honourable John Munro, Minister of Labour, is also the minister responsible for multiculturalism. However, there is no separate, single department of multiculturalism. Multicultural programs are to be found in a wide variety of departments and agencies.

Mr. Munro will soon be receiving a report of a study to determine the extent of these programs in each department and agency.

Question II. (b) was:

What is the size of this departmental budget?

I have no information on that particular item as a result of the preceding information.

Question II.(c) was:

How large a fund does he administer for the purposes of multiculturalism?

The answer is:

Administration of funds for multiculturalism is the responsibility of each minister to whose department or agency Treasury Board has assigned those funds.

Question II.(d) was:

How much was spent by the government on multiculturalism to March 31, 1975, and how much remains to be spent?

The answer is:

From the inception of the Multicultural Program within the Department of the Secretary of State in October 1971, a total of $19,160,000 has been budgeted until the end of the fiscal year 1974-75, including operations, grants and cultural agencies. The budget for 1975-76 including operations and grants is $5,601,000. Figures for cultural agencies are not yet available but will be forthcoming.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I am very grateful to Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, for this information on government funding for multiculturalism. I intend to study these figures thoroughly, and later in the session I may have some comments to make.

AIR CANADA

SERVICE BETWEEN FREDERICTON AND OTTAWA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, last evening a question was posed by one of our colleagues from New Brunswick, Senator Burchill, relating to the provision of air transportation by Air Canada from Fredericton to Ottawa. The allegation was made that direct flights are no longer in existence between these two cities.

I have been informed by the Minister of Transport that under the old Air Canada schedule there were four Fredericton-Ottawa flights. All flights stopped in Montreal and, therefore, could not really be described as "direct" flights. I am informed that one of the four flights which stopped in Montreal allowed passengers to stay on the plane during refuelling and then proceeded to Ottawa.

Under the new schedule there are now three Air Canada flights from Fredericton to Ottawa, all three flights stopping in Montreal. However, in this schedule passengers must de-plane for the continuation of the trip to Ottawa.

I am informed that the Air Canada rescheduling was based primarily on the fact that Eastern Provincial Airways now has a Fredericton-Montreal flight and convenient connections can then be made from Montreal. Air Canada found there was not sufficient business to justify four flights with Eastern Provincial Airways having this supplementary flight. Rescheduling of flights is made in conjunction with overall Air Canada policy, which is to make the best use of aircraft while supplying the needs of passengers wishing to use the Fredericton-Ottawa route.

If there are a number of people who wish a change made in the Air Canada schedule, they should make representations to the company with a view to having changes made.

TAX TREATIES

COUNTRIES WITH WHICH CANADA HAS CONCLUDED TREATIES OR CONVENTIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must apologise for the time I have taken during the Question Period. However, before resuming my seat, I shall endeavour to reply to a question posed last evening by Senator Grosart relating to tax treaties and tax conventions.

May I say, in reply to the first part of his question, that since 1971 Canada has not concluded any tax treaties relating to the avoidance of double taxation or fiscal evasion. The Canada-France Tax Treaty on this subject, signed by the Minister of Finance last week, was the first such treaty.

In answer to the second part of the question, negotiations with regard to tax treaties relating to this subject are currently underway with the following countries:

|--------------------|-------------|
| Austria | Mexico |
| Bangladesh | Morocco |
| Barbados | Netherlands |
| Belgium | New Zealand |
| Brazil | Norway |
| Dominican Republic | Pakistan |
| Finland | Philippines |
| Germany | Portugal |

|-------------|--------------------------|
| India | Senegal |
| Indonesia | Singapore |
| Ireland | Spain |
| Israel | Sweden |
| Italy | Switzerland |
| Ivory Coast | Trinidad and Tobago |
| Jamaica | Tunisia |
| Kenya | United Kingdom |
| Korea | United States of America |
| Liberia | Zambia |
| Malaysia. | |

So, honourable senators, it is obvious that there is a great deal of activity under way.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government make any report to the Senate about the longshoremen's strike in Quebec?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no further report as of this afternoon, but I shall certainly endeavour to obtain a report and give it later today with the permission of the Senate.

FORT-FALLS BRIDGE AUTHORITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Molgat moved the third reading of Bill C-367, to amend the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Molgat a question? Who is the owner of the new bridge that is to be built, and will any ownership in the new bridge reside in the Boise Cascade Company? I understand that tolls will be charged on the new bridge. Can he tell me on what basis those tolls will be arrived at?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the new bridge will be owned by the Authority, as it is called, which was established under the original act, which was assented to on June 30, 1971. The amendments proposed in Bill C-367 do not change that Authority per se. The Authority would be made up of four appointees from the American side and four from the Canadian side. That Authority will actually own and operate the bridge, whereas the present bridge, I believe, is privately owned by the Boise Cascade Company, the Ontario and Minnesota Pulp and Paper Company, and the Minnesota and Ontario Pulp and Paper Company.

The Authority, under the act, will build the bridge and will then settle the tolls, depending on the cost of the bridge, in order to amortize it. I am not sure for how many years it will be amortized, but certainly the effect of the tolls is to cover the cost of the bridge.

Senator Everett: I thank the honourable senator for his comprehensive answer.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT, THE SALARIES ACT AND THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act and the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, it is a most unpleasant task for members of Parliament to deal with their own remuneration. It has often been suggested that we should find a way of dealing with this matter other than by the type of legislation with which we are confronted today. However, even if we were to appoint a commission which, in turn, made a recommendation for an increase in the indemnities and allowances paid to members of Parliament, the final decision would still rest with Parliament itself. Whether we are counselled one way or another, it will always be our responsibility and no one else can assume that responsibility for us.

The matter of increasing the indemnities and allowances paid to members of Parliament is a task which must be faced with as much objectivity as possible. It is not an easy task. There is always a great public outcry whenever a bill of this kind comes before Parliament. People say there is a conflict of interest because we are in fact voting ourselves an increase in remuneration. In the minds of a great many people, we are not worth what we appear to consider ourselves to be worth. It is not easy to reply to that type of criticism.

After listening to the speeches on this bill by Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government, and Senator Lawson, I feel a bit more at ease. There is very little that I can add by way of support for the bill. I could never hope to equal their performance on this subject.

The problem as far as I am concerned can be divided into three questions. First of all, do members of Parliament need at this time an increase in the indemnities and allowances paid, and what are the principles which should govern the question? Secondly, are the increases provided in this bill adequate? Thirdly, is the method followed by this legislation the best that can be devised?

Dealing with the first question, I should say that, in Canada generally, we have recognized over the years that the indemnities and allowances paid to members of Parliament should be sufficient to enable them to preserve their independence while, at the same time, underlying the importance of Parliament and providing an incentive for the best men and women in the country to want to serve in Parliament. Consequently, the theory that prevailed at one time at Westminster that a member of Parliament should be satisfied mainly with the honour to serve, with the result that only well-to-do persons were in a position to stand for election, has never prevailed in Canada. Canada has never accepted that Parliament should become a rich man's club.

Another factor to be taken into account is that today a member of Parliament operates practically on a full-time basis, whereas up until World War II the sessions of the federal Parliament lasted between two and three months and those of the provincial legislatures lasted only a few weeks.

Turning to the second question, whether the increases provided in this bill are adequate, guidelines can be sought in many areas. Looking first at the salaries paid to top public servants, there are 8,000 public servants earning between $20,000 and $30,000 a year. In addition, as was mentioned by Senator Lawson, there are more than 1,000 public servants in this city alone who earn in the area of $60,000 a year.

Another guideline, of course, is the income of professionals in 1972. I have checked and determined that the average physician in 1972 earned $41,200, the average lawyer $30,500, the average dentist $28,300 and the average engineer $28,500. I leave it to you to determine what these people are earning today, three years later. I have some idea as to lawyers!

Honourable senators, what the public has to decide is what importance they attach to politicians. Are they as important to the country as civil servants, doctors, lawyers, engineers? If so, should they not be paid a comparable salary?

We have to recognize that members of Parliament, of course, do not fit into unique molds, as do some professionals. On the whole, I would suggest the value of a member of Parliament should be determined on the basis of good average qualifications for a job of great importance.

Should we, because of a period of inflation, require parliamentarians to set an example? No doubt. But not to a point where they would put themselves into financial difficulties, when all other groups of society do not submit to any restraint, as I shall try to show later.

The effect of this bill will prove that parliamentarians are very reasonable indeed. In any event, last night Senator Lawson gave us figures to prove the point. It will be remembered that only a few days ago we ordered the stevedores of the ports of the St. Lawrence to go back to work under conditions providing increases of 60 per cent over the next three years, which does not take into account what they have been receiving over the past five years, the period during which no increases were granted to parliamentarians.

Honourable senators, until 1953 the remuneration of parliamentarians was on a sessional basis of $4,000 at that time. In order to compensate for the insufficiency of this indemnity, Parliament had begun the habit of having two sessions a year, and for that reason, in order to dissipate any doubt or criticism, a change was made to an annual indemnity of $8,000 a year. From 1953 to 1963 the indemnity remained unchanged. In 1963 it was increased by 50 per cent, from $8,000 to $12,000, and the expense allowance, which had been $2,000 up until then, was increased by 200 per cent to $6,000 for members of the House of Commons, and by 50 per cent, to $3,000, for members of the Senate. This increase was, of course, substantial, because it was long overdue. I remember many of my colleagues in the Twenty-fourth Parliament, from 1958 to 1962, found themselves in financial difficulties, and I always regretted that the Progressive Conservative administration of that time never saw its way clear to face the issue.

In any event, in 1970 the government appointed an advisory committee on parliamentary salaries and allowances. They submitted a very good report, which formed the base for the adjustment later that year, which brought the indemnity to $18,000 for a member of the Commons and of the Senate, and an allowance of $8,000 to a member of the Commons and $4,000 to a member of the Senate.

Since then, I suggest, the increase in the cost of living and the increase in the composite industrial index, as quoted last night by both Senator Perrault and Senator Lawson, have proved beyond any doubt that the increase of 33½ per cent provided in this bill for members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate is not exaggerated at all. In fact, when you consider that in the beginning it was intended that this would cover the whole period of this Parliament up until 1978, neither was the figure of 50 per cent exaggerated.

So far as I am concerned, the original figures were more adequate because they were set to cover a period of nine years, covering any increase from 1970 to date and any possible increase until 1978.

The bill before us deals also with the increase of salaries and indemnities to the Prime Minister, ministers and other members discharging special responsibilities in Parliament.

The increases provided originally by the recommendation of the Governor in Council were also in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent, but it must be remembered that these salaries were first determined in 1953-54, which is almost 23 years ago. If I am not mistaken, the Prime Minister has been receiving less than senior civil servants, and much less than presidents or chairmen of crown corporations. The ministers of government have for some years now been receiving much less than their deputy ministers. Thus, while I am happy to see that they are being provided with this increase of one-third, I still think the government should have stuck to its original figure of 50 per cent, because when one compares these figures with the 1952 or 1953 level they are, in my view, totally inadequate.

While I am quite happy with what the bill has provided for the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, I am sorry to see that nothing has been provided for the whips in this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: I believe it had been the intention to include a special remuneration for them, and it would have been justified, because they are doing an excellent job for the Senate, and one which is worthy of further remuneration. I hope that situation can be corrected eventually.

Another aspect of the bill with which I am not too pleased is the discrepancy it makes between the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Speaker of the Senate. I believe the discrepancy is the result of a mere accident in the other place. Apparently two members who were entirely opposed to the bill in the other place moved an amendment to increase the salary of the Speaker of the House of Commons to the original figure of $20,000. They could do that owing to the fact that the original recommendation provided $20,000 and was then subsequently decreased in committee by $5,000. Unfortunately, when they provided for the Speaker of the House of Commons they said nothing about the Speaker of the Senate, and as a result there is this too large discrepancy which exists between the salaries of the two Speakers. I certainly hope something will be done about that, although I do not know what can be done. It may even be an illusion to think that we can do anything about it at this time, but I certainly hope the situation will be rectified. The responsibility of the Speaker of the Senate may not be the same as that of the House of Commons, agreed; but the difference now in salary is too large. I think all senators will agree that the Speaker of the Senate does a tremendous job on behalf of the government as well as on behalf of the Senate and Parliament itself. The Speaker of the Senate discharges a great many responsibilities in the domain of external affairs and public relations, for Parliament and for the government, and this should be taken into consideration.

The bill maintains the so-called tax-free allowance for expenses incurred by parliamentarians in the discharge of their duties. Very often this expense allowance is referred to as part of the remuneration of parliamentarians, but of course, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government last night, that is entirely wrong. Some comments were made in this respect by Senator Lawson, with which I agree. The Beaupré report had recommended that this system be changed, but of course it is a very difficult matter. Possibly this aspect of the problem should be studied by the committee, which there is provision to appoint in this piece of legislation after the beginning of the next Parliament.

Honourable senators, I now come to my third question. Is the method followed by this legislation the best? The Beaupré report did not contain any specific recommendation concerning this problem, although the terms of reference of that committee invited them to suggest a procedure for a periodic review of the salaries of parliamentarians. It left it to another advisory committee, to be appointed later, to make some suggestions, and now the Leader of the Government tells us that it is the intention of the government to do that. I have looked at the bill with regard to this problem, and to me it does not seem too clear whether subclause (7) of clause 2 of the bill deals with the whole problem. It says:

Within two months after the day fixed for return of the writs at each general election, the Governor in Council shall appoint commissioners to inquire into the adequacy of the annual variations of sessional allowances payable to members of the Senate and House of Commons and other allowances payable to them and to report thereon to the Governor in Council, with such recommendations as they consider appropriate, within six months after the time of their appointment.

Looking at the whole of clause 2, it seems to me that the indexation of the annual remuneration and the sessional indemnity is to be in accordance with the industrial composite index. It does not say that this will be changed after the beginning of the next Parliament.

In other paragraphs of this section reference is made to the salaries and allowances available to members of the Senate. We are not too sure whether the salaries referred to mean the annual indemnity and the expense allowances, so I am not too sure whether the commissioners who are to be appointed by the Governor in Council will have the responsibility of determining, as well, the annual indemnity; that is, the salaries and the allowances of members of Parliament. I do not know if the Leader of the Government will be able to reply to that question when he closes the debate on second reading, but I would certainly like to be enlightened in this regard.

There is no doubt that it would be in the interests of parliamentarians to have this problem dealt with in a way that would avoid the usual controversy and outcries from people who, generally, are not aware of the situation in which parliamentarians find themselves. I would say that very few, outside of those who have experienced the life of a parliamentarian, can assess his problems in respect of remuneration. On the other hand, as I said before, it seems to me that in the end it will always be the responsibility of Parliament to sanction changes in remuneration, whatever they may be.

What has disturbed me more than anything else in the debate which has taken place since late December in this connection is the general contempt that has been shown by the public and the communications media for parliamentarians in general. It seems to me that people do not appreciate or understand the responsibilities or the role of parliamentarians or the importance of Parliament in the course and life of the nation. I do not know whether we should blame the communications media, some other sector of society, or even some members of Parliament, but there is no doubt that the contempt in which a large sector of public opinion holds Parliament should be a cause of worry not only to us, but, I would say, to Canada as a nation. I suggest that something should be done by the media; something should be done by us all to correct this attitude.

Politicians are like everyone else: they will attempt to live up to the opinion that people hold of them. If we treat their occupation as important to the welfare of the country, and make clear that we expect of them industry, high moral character, and a well-developed sense of responsibility, and back our views with appropriate financial remuneration, we will not only get better politicians but we will get out of them the best of which they are capable.

Honourable senators, I support the bill.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, when I made my maiden speech in this chamber, I made a rather lengthy introductory statement on the question of the special problems a senator, who is a partner in a corporation law firm, has with respect to possible conflict of interest when a bill is being considered which may affect one of his corporate clients. In that case, the possible conflict of interest is indirect. For the bill being considered here today, the conflict of interest, as far as I am concerned, is not just possible and indirect, but actual and direct, as it is with every other senator. Let us consider the definition of conflict of interest. In a recent study on conflict of interest, it is defined as follows:

[Senator Flynn.]

A conflict of interest denotes a situation in which a member of Parliament has a personal or a private pecuniary interest sufficient to influence, or appear to influence, the exercise of his public duties and responsibilities.

Rule 49(1) of the Senate says:

(b) a senator shall not be entitled to vote upon any question in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, and the vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed;

There is no doubt that this bill involves a classic case of conflict of interest for every senator in this chamber, as it did for every member of the Cabinet and House of Commons, and the plain language of this rule would technically disqualify every member of this chamber from voting on this bill. Fortunately, however, common sense and practicability have prevailed over plain English, and I am advised that custom, precedent and the recognized authorities on parliamentary practice permit the members of this chamber to vote on this bill, notwithstanding rule 49(1)(b). I only mention the rule because this further illustrates, as pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition, that our consideration of and voting on this bill is an exception and a necessary one to the general rule re senators voting on matters involving a conflict of interest. I might also mention that this bill frankly recognized the conflict of interest problem when it was amended in the other place to include a provision providing for the appointment of commissioners after each election to inquire into the adequacy of members' compensation and allowances.

Now, I happen to have believed for many years that members of the House of Commons and the Cabinet have been grossly underpaid. Long before I was a member of this house, I was well aware of the importance of the duties of the members of the Cabinet and the private members of the House of Commons and how hard most of them worked. Like the vast majority of my fellow Canadians, I must confess that I knew little about what the Senate did, other than the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the investigative committees.

What does the public think of us? In Robert A. MacKay's book, The Unreformed Senate of Canada, the latest edition of which was published in 1967, he says at page 144,

A senatorship is popularly assumed to be a sinecure, whereas a judgeship or membership on a board or commission is assumed to be a working post.

Mr. MacKay is very favourably disposed towards the Senate, and his assessment of what the public thinks of us is, I would assume, fair and unbiased.

● (1440)

I would like to quote another authority on the Senate, namely, Senator Grattan O'Leary. I understand that what I am referring to has been quoted often before, but bears repeating in full, even if Senator O'Leary may be sick and tired of hearing it:

A senatorship isn't a job, it's a title. Also it's a blessing, a stroke of good fate; something like drawing a royal straight flush in the biggest pot of the evening, or winning the Calcutta Sweep. That's why we think it wrong to think of a senatorship as a job; and wrong to think of the Senate as a place where people are supposed to work. Pensions aren't given for work.

Senator O'Leary made this statement in 1942, some 20 years before he was appointed to the Senate, at a time when he was hardly the mature man we now know, love and respect. In fact, he was only a young stripling of 54 at the time, and possibly it is unfair to quote these adolescent remarks. However, I do so only because I want to bring home as forcibly as I can, that what the members of the public mainly object to about the Senate is that they think it is a sinecure and that most of us are pensioners who don't work. This is not true of most senators, but, alas, it is true of some.

I can well recall Madam Speaker explaining in this chamber, before she was elevated to her present august position, what she had said on a television program, namely, that one-third of the senators were very active, another third were moderately active and that another third were either ill, absent or indifferent. From my experience since I have been here, I would tend to agree with Madam Speaker. I also read with interest her speech on Senate reform, in which she said, as reported in Senate Hansard of July 4, 1973, at page 820:

As regards sitting attendance, it is to be regretted that some colleagues are behaving like school truants... some colleagues disappear for several weeks and are to be seen only on great occasions and justify their absence by explanations whose value or credibility stretches the imagination.

And later in the same speech she said:

Attendance at the meetings of the various standing committees sometimes leaves room for improvement. While the membership of each committee has been reduced to 20, several chairmen cannot rely on more than six or seven faithful participants since the others are satisfied with seeing their name appear on the list as they never take part in the proceedings and are very seldom present.

Devotion to work is obviously related to the interest shown in the sittings of the Senate as well as those of the standing committees.

I mention all this because there is one thing that bothered me before I became a senator, has concerned me since, and certainly concerns the public and the media, namely: Should senators be paid the same as members of the Commons? This is a problem which we must look at as objectively as possible, because we all do have a pecuniary interest which is certainly sufficient to influence, or to appear to influence, our judgment in the exercise of our public duties and responsibilities and is not held in common with the rest of Canadians. It is important, therefore, to make sure that we seek the advice and opinions of others to make sure that we are not being influenced by our own pecuniary interest, and this I have done.

The main argument I hear against paying senators as much is that we do not sit as often or as long as the Commons, and the duties of the members of the Commons, particularly as they relate to constituency work, are much more onerous than those of most senators. The latter is one of the specific reasons given in the Beaupré report when they recommended that the members of the Senate be paid less than members of the Commons.

The second argument I hear is that our attendance isn't very good, even although we sit much less often.

There is a certain validity to the first argument. What are the facts as far as sittings of the two houses are concerned? I have gone back to 1964 and will give the figures in each year thereafter, first for the Senate and then the Commons:

| Year | Senate | House of Commons |
| 1964 | 91 | 214 |
| 1965 | 38 | 87 |
| 1966 | 83 | 180 |
| 1967 | 71 | 176 |
| 1968 | 66 | 118 |

I will pause here and say that for those five years the Commons averaged 155 days of sittings and the Senate 70 days, or an average for the Senate of 45 per cent of the number of sitting days of the Commons.

I will proceed, and I might mention that we now come into the era of Senator Martin, who introduced the Tuesday night sittings and who believed the Senate should meet more frequently—

Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Godfrey: Is that not correct? I thought it was.

Senator Flynn: You are wrong.

Senator Godfrey: I will withdraw that.

Senator Walker: I know you have given members of the press gallery copies of your speech because I can see them following it, but we do not have copies here and you are reading awfully fast as well as inaccurately.

Senator Godfrey: I have here a continuation of the figures from the year 1969 to 1974 inclusive. They are as follows:

| Year | Senate | House of Commons |
|------|--------|------------------|
| 1970 | 91 | 164 |
| 1971 | 106 | 192 |
| 1972 | 50 | 93 |
| 1973 | 104 | 197 |
| 1974 | 77 | 117 |

For the last six years the Commons again averaged 155 days of sittings and the Senate's average rose to 84 or 54 per cent of the number of sittings of the Commons.

As to the second argument—

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Was that all on the first argument? Is the yardstick being used by my honourable friend the number of sitting days?

Senator Godfrey: No, it is not. Now as to the second argument, there are undoubtedly some senators who are inclined to accept membership as an honour rather than as a public trust, and who just don't pull their weight. There are other senators who do not attend because of ill health.

I have tried to look at this whole question as objectively as possible, which is difficult because I do not claim any special virtues. I suppose I am just as greedy as most people, but my greediness is tempered somewhat by the fact that I am a recent appointee and can, therefore, easily recall my own prejudices about the Senate, not only before I was appointed to it but also before I had any desire or thought of being a member of it. Furthermore, as a recent appointee my friends do not seem to have the same inhibitions in telling me what they think of the Senate as they might have with respect to a veteran senator. The majority of their views are highly prejudiced, but still should not be ignored if we can do something about correcting them. Many have an exaggerated idea of the average age of the senators and the poor state of their health. Some of my friends even expressed surprise that I was appointed at an age which they considered very young for a senator. They also have an exaggerated idea as to the number of senators who appear only occasionally.

I had someone check the attendance record for each sitting in 1974, and the average attendance worked out to 60 senators per sitting, or roughly two-thirds. It is not always the same senators who are away all the time, and I have not analyzed the figures to check the records of each individual senator. However, it doesn't take long around here to see who are the faithful attenders and who are not, and I would estimate that there are about 75 senators who are either excellent, good or fairly good in their attendance, at least at the start of each sitting. About half of these seem to evaporate fairly quickly during each sitting, unless there is something of particular interest being debated. This does not bother me, because I agree with Mr. MacKay in his book, which I have already referred to, when he says at page 82:

—it is doubtful whether the necessary work of the Senate actually suffers from non-attendance. In any deliberative body effective work is normally done by the responsible and interested few. The Senate always seems to have a sound corps who take their duties so seriously, whether in committee or in the House.

I have found from personal experience that the conscientious senator has no difficulty turning his duties into a full-time job when Parliament is in session. For that reason I think it would be manifestly unfair for those senators who accepted the appointment on the basis that they would consider it a full-time job, and who actually devote all of their time to either Senate work or other public or official business, if those senators did not receive the same sessional allowance as members of the House of Commons, plus a reasonable expense allowance.

Furthermore, there are other senators who, while not making it a full-time job, are conscientious in their attendance, make an excellent contribution and, because of their outside earning power, often make a considerable financial sacrifice when they attend to their senatorial duties. These senators also should, in my opinion, receive the same sessional allowance as members of the House of Commons, provided they are regular in their attendance.

It is the third class of senators mentioned by Madam Speaker in her speech who, in my opinion, do not deserve anywhere near the same remuneration as the conscientious senators and members of the House of Commons. I decided to do a little calculating to see how much a senator who attended only one sitting a year, was in good health and not absent on public business, so that he was subject to full deductions, could make in an average year under the provisions of this bill. If you take the average of 84 sitting days for the last six years and deduct from that the 21 days of permissible absence, plus the one day of attendance, such senator would have a non-attendance deduction for 62 days at $60 per day from his sessional allowance and $60 per day from his expense allowance, or $3,720 from each allowance. This would leave him, under this bill, with a sessional allowance of $20,280 and a non-taxable expense allowance of $1,580, or a total of $21,860, which is not bad pay for one day's work in any language. When you consider that the true value of his non-taxable expense allowance which, except for a few dollars, he does not have to use for any expenses connected with the Senate, is nearly double the amount received, such a senator is really getting approximately $23,500 for his one day's work.

I appreciate that it is not giving the true picture for the immediate future or probably for the next 3½ years to use the average figure. However, even if one takes the maximum number of days the Senate has sat in the last 11 years—namely, 106—this would still result in a senator attending one day having a sessional allowance of $18,960 and an expense allowance of $260, for a total of $19,220.

Either figure, of course, is ridiculous unless one happens to agree with the immature remarks of Senator O'Leary. This simply illustrates two points. First, the daily deductions for non-attendance are not high enough; second, the 21 days of non-attendance permitted is simply too many in relation to the average number of days we sit.

As to the first point, the total $120 per day deduction was first instituted in 1963, when the sessional allowance was $12,000 per year and the expense allowance $2,000. Nothing was done to increase this deduction in 1971 when the sessional allowance was increased to $18,000 and the expense allowance to $4,000. Now that the sessional allowance is to be $24,000, which is double the 1963 figure, and the expense allowance is $5,300, then in all logic the combined deduction of $120 per day should be increased to at least double, or $240 per day.

Let us now consider the second point, namely the 21 days of permitted absence a year before deductions start. This is the same as the House of Commons, and there is no logic in that, in view of the fact that we have sat on an average only 55 per cent of the number of days that the House of Commons sat in the last six years, so that in an average year a senator can miss 25 per cent of the sittings without valid excuse before deductions are made.

Also bear in mind that nearly one-third of the Senate sittings are on a Tuesday night at 8 o'clock, and seldom go on for more than one and one-half hours. As a Toronto senator, I can work in my law office until 5:30 p.m. on Tuesdays, and be in my seat in the Senate comfortably at 8 p.m. Because of Airtransit, Montreal senators can leave downtown Montreal even later and be here in time. Lately, of course, some of our standing committees have been sitting on Tuesdays during the day, and this results in the attendance of the conscientious senators in Ottawa for the whole of the day.

The senators from the Prairies and the Maritimes have a more difficult problem. British Columbia senators presently have to leave Vancouver airport at 9:15 in the morning to be in their seats at 8 o'clock in the evening, thus losing a whole day, and if they have committee meetings during the day they must leave the previous afternoon at 1 p.m. unless they are prepared to take the "cardiac special," to which Senator Perrault referred, and fly all night. We have heard from Senator Rowe about the very poor connections between Ottawa and Newfoundland, and how long it takes the Newfoundland senators to go back and forth.

In all fairness, therefore, it would seem reasonable to vary the number of permissible days of absence according to the region the senator represents. In my opinion, the number of permissible days of absence before deductions start should be reduced to 11 for senators from Ontario and Quebec, to 16 days for senators from the Prairies and the Maritimes, and for senators from Newfoundland and British Columbia it should remain at 21 days.

What would be the result for Ontario and Quebec senators if the permissible number of days of absence was reduced to 11, the $60 per day deduction from the expense allowance remained the same and the deduction from the sessional allowance was tripled to $180, for a combined total of $240?

On the basis of the average of 84 sitting days such a senator would be left with a sessional allowance of $10,840 and an expense allowance of $813, for a total of $11,653. On the basis of 106 days of sittings, this would result in a senator attending one day having a sessional allowance of $7,080 and no expense allowance. For a lifetime senator, both of these amounts would be significantly less than the pension which it is proposed he receive at 75 under the amendments to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act recently introduced into the House of Commons, so that for a lifetime senator who attends only rarely there would be a significant financial advantage and inducement for him to retire on pension at 75.

The provision in the statutes which seems to be universally condemned is that which permits a senator who is ill to appear at only one sitting every two years, and yet still draw his full sessional and expense allowance until he dies, which may not be for many years. Why should a senator who is too ill to attend the Senate, and thus in practically every such case has no "expenses incidental to the discharge of his duties as a member," be entitled to an expense allowance during his illness? The senator who stays at home because of illness and does nothing is presently much better off financially than the senator who travels to Ottawa to attend sittings of the Senate and has to pay hotel and other expenses.

Furthermore, why should a senator who is ill, and incapable of ever properly performing his duties again, be entitled to his full sessional allowance so long as he can appear in the chamber once every two years? Why should he receive more than the conscientious lifetime senator who voluntarily retires on pension at 75, or more than the conscientious and honourable senator who voluntarily retires on pension before 75 because he cannot properly perform his duties, either because of ill-health or because he has assumed other obligations?

It seems reasonable to me that the same rules should apply in the Senate as apply in the federal civil service when a civil servant is away on account of illness. I know that we are not the same as civil servants, but we are all part of the federal governmental process and our remuneration is paid out of the same tax pot. I understand that civil servants are entitled to sick leave of 15 days a year, and that this is fully cumulative. This seems to me very fair, and a veteran senator could accumulate over the years enough sick leave entitlement to take care of a lengthy illness. For example, someone who has been in the Senate for 10 years and has not taken any sick leave would have accumulated 150 days, which would permit him to be away for at least 1½ years, even if the Senate was very busy, without deduction from his pay. Furthermore, a senator who is absent on account of sickness ordinarily does not have any expenses in connection with his senatorial duties.

Therefore, there should be no exemption from deduction from expense allowance for non-attendance because of illness, except in those cases in which a senator keeps a permanent residence in Ottawa as well as one in his home province, and thus still has extra expenses. In that case it would be reasonable if the deduction were reduced to, say, $30 per day.

What should the Senate do to correct the situation along the lines I have indicated? One obvious way of doing so would be to amend this bill. An objection to following this course is that we may get diverted into the old technical argument with certain members in the other place as to whether the Senate can or should amend a money bill. This can be avoided, because I have discovered that it is within the power of the Senate to accomplish most of what I propose without having to amend this bill. During my research on this subject I discovered the provisions of section 40 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, which are as follows:

The Senate or the House of Commons may respectively make regulations, from time to time, by rule or by order, rendering more stringent upon its own members the provisions of this Act that relate to attendance of members or to deductions to be made from the sessional allowance.

This section has been in effect since 1923, but apparently has never been used, possibly because very few senators knew of its existence. It is to be noted that this section only permits the Senate to be more stringent upon its own members with respect to deductions to be made from the sessional allowance. It does not permit it to be more stringent with respect to deductions to be made from the expense allowance. In any event, the $60 deduction from the expense allowance appears to be a reasonable one, and in order to double the amount of the total deduction it is reasonable, in my opinion, that the increased deduction be confined solely to the deduction from the sessional allowance.

What I propose to do, therefore, so that I can conscientiously vote for this bill in its present form, is to give notice of a motion at the next sitting of the Senate that there be a regulation by order reflecting those changes I have advocated in this speech relating to the attendance of senators and deductions to be made from the sessional allowance to the extent possible under the provisions of section 40 of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

To summarize, this regulation, which I will propose, will provide for:

First, the increasing of the deduction for non-attendance from the sessional allowance from $60 per day to $180 per day, for a combined deduction from the expense and sessional allowances of $240 per day;

Second, the reducing of permissible days of absence without deduction for Ontario and Quebec senators from 21 days per year to 11 days; for senators from the Prairie Provinces and the Maritimes from 21 days to 16 days, with senators from Newfoundland and British Columbia remaining the same; and Third, that the permissible days of absence on account of illness without deduction from the sessional allowance be 15 days per calendar year, with such days to be fully cumulative from the date of the senator's summons to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: How is your health?

Senator Carter: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Godfrey: Certainly.

Senator Carter: What point were you trying to make when you compared the sittings of the Senate with the sittings of the Commons? Were you suggesting that the wasting of precious time through endless and unnecessary repetition has some special virtue which should be rewarded; or, to put it another way, if the Commons takes 30 days to deal with a piece of legislation and the Senate deals adequately with that same piece of legislation in 10 days, are you suggesting that the Senate should be penalized for being efficient?

Senator Godfrey: No, certainly not. I thought I had made my point, that the sole purpose of bringing that out is really to show that ordinarily we do not have to attend in Ottawa on Mondays and Fridays, and therefore we get all of those days of permissible absences compared with the House of Commons. I was speaking in reference only to reducing the deduction of the number of permissible days of absence from 21 to 11 for Senate members from Ontario and Quebec.

Furthermore, I think we are entitled to know what are the facts. I examined the situation, looked at the facts, and presented them to this house. I was wrong in one respect, which I quickly corrected when this was pointed out to me. Based upon the facts, I think we should be entitled to the same amount as members of the Commons, provided senators are conscientious and turn up. I do believe, however, that we should reduce the number of days of permissible absence and increase the daily rate of penalty for non-attendance.

Senator Greene: I know the honourable senator would not wish to mislead the chamber. I wonder if he could tell us where he obtained his information that a member of the other place is penalized for absence beyond 21 days? It is my understanding that no attendance is taken in the other place, and that a member of the other place is answerable only to his electorate.

Senator Godfrey: The Senate and House of Commons Act contains a provision which requires members of both the Senate and the Commons—

Senator Asselin: It has never been applied.

Senator Godfrey: Excuse me. I am sorry. I was just telling the honourable senator what the act says. It is my understanding that a member of the House of Commons must file a signed monthly statement as to the number of days he attended during the month. The Senate has always been excused, even though the section in the act applies also to the Senate, because, unlike the Commons, we do have an attendance record. I presume the reason we record attendances—I understand it goes back to Confederation—is to be able to find out whether a senator has not turned up for two years, and therefore forfeited his seat.

Senator Croll: Does the honourable senator know that his absence may be because of public duty? He may be 60 miles away, and may well be considered to be on public service.

Senator Godfrey: I would suggest that if members of the Senate perform public duty, the same as a member of the House of Commons, the same rules apply. But we are less liable to be absent for that reason because we do not have the constituency work.

Senator Walker: The honourable senator is a new boy. But would he also have the grace, when his seniors get up to speak or to ask a question, to take his seat and not continue talking? May I ask him, in view of the fact that he read every word of his speech, whether he wrote it; and, if it was not written by him, whether it was written by Stanley Knowles?

Senator Godfrey: On the honourable senator's first point, I am grateful to him for pointing that out. I had not realized that as a new senator I should take my seat when an honourable senator is asking a question. On his second point, I wrote every word myself.

Senator Flynn: I believe you.

Senator Molson: May I ask the honourable senator if, in considering the matter of attendance, it came to his mind that perhaps in any modification we should consider attendance at committees? It has been pointed out over several years—perhaps even before he came here—that the work of the committees is quite exacting at certain times, and in fact committee attendance is perhaps just as important as our attendance—or the sometimes brief attendance he alluded to—in the chamber. If we are going to start modifying the basis on which we receive our just reward for our just effort, some consideration at the same time should be given to the very valuable work done by many of our committee members who meet on days or at times when the Senate itself is not sitting.

Senator Godfrey: In reply, I certainly did give consideration to that point. That is a difficult problem. I could not really see what the solution would be, except that, generally speaking, with few exceptions, in my limited experience—I am only speaking of my limited experience—

Senate committees have met on the same days, on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays—

Senator Molson: Not necessarily. That is not fair.

Senator Godfrey: If that is wrong, I would like honourable senators to point out the number of days in this session, not on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, that Senate committees have met. If someone can come up with a bright idea, fine.

Senator Flynn: Well, you haven't yet.

Senator Walker: May I ask another question of my learned and distinguished Senate friend, our new man? It is a pleasure to have you. I heard a rumour—I think it is true—that you were against the increase. You have changed your mind on that; is that correct? You are now in favour of the increase. If so, with the views that you held very strongly 48 hours ago, are you going to accept it?

Senator Godfrey: To begin with, I was against the original proposed increase of 50 per cent—definitely and strongly. I did not see how it could be justified in light of the statement made by the Prime Minister during the debate on the Speech from the Throne in which he asked everyone to restrain himself and not to take a larger slice out of the pie. I am in favour of the present increase of 33½ per cent, which I consider reasonable.

Senator Walker: You are in favour of a smaller slice.

Senator Godfrey: Had an increase of 33½ per cent been proposed in the first place, I do not think we would have had the outcry we had. I also think it is reasonable that the future yearly increases be confined to the 7 per cent maximum, showing that if we are not successful in combating inflation, members of Parliament will suffer some penalty.

I am generally in favour of this bill as it is presently drafted. However, I cannot understand why everything is increased but the daily rate of deduction for non-attendance established in 1963. If we are going to increase the indemnities, why should not the rate of deduction be increased also?

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, in view of the public interest in this legislation and the reactions to Bill C-44 across Canada, it would be surprising if in this chamber of some 90-odd members some voices were not raised to discuss the reasons for the concerns expressed and whether or not they are valid. I certainly have no desire to embarrass or invite the displeasure of my peers, but I feel an obligation to say that I, personally, cannot support this bill. In all fairness I think I should outline what has led me to that conclusion.

In moving second reading, the Leader of the Government referred to the fact that the subject of sessional indemnities has always been a thorny and contentious issue. Anyone who has had experience in government can certainly agree wholeheartedly with that statement.

Before discussing the specific provisions of Bill C-44, may I therefore offer a suggestion that I hope will be considered by those who are seeking a more satisfactory formula in order to prevent the government from having to face this periodic problem. I would invite your consideration of the merits of a formula that would have two features not presently employed. The first would be a basic statutory indemnity providing for an automatic increase in compensation for members on their first and probably second re-elections to Parliament. I appreciate that this formula would be more applicable to the elective House than to this chamber.

Parliament is one of the few fields where experience is not recognized or rewarded, and where no special training or preparation is required before a man or woman can serve his or her country as a representative. The first term of a newly elected member of Parliament is, of necessity, largely a period for gaining knowledge and experience in the functions and responsibilities of government. If the member offers his services and is re-elected for a second term, the knowledge and experience that he can apply to his work surely should be recognized and rewarded.

It would not seem reasonable to extend an indemnity differential beyond, perhaps, his second re-election, because by that time he would have served, normally, eight years in Parliament, and he would be completely knowledgeable on the processes of government.

In addition to the justice of recognizing and rewarding experience, a graduated indemnity would tend to encourage men and women to give more than one term in the service of their country. If they knew that there was an automatic increase in the indemnity at their first and second re-election, to some degree, at least, this would encourage them to devote more years of their lives to this important field.

A second feature I should like to see considered in a formula of this kind is an automatic fixed dollar increase in all three levels of indemnities at the beginning of each new Parliament. That would mean that once every four years, normally, without going through the debate and hassle that happens whenever this kind of legislation is introduced, there would be an automatic increase, the amount of which would be known in advance. I stress the fact that in my view this should be a fixed dollar amount rather than a percentage increase, or an amount geared to some indexing, as is proposed in the present legislation.

I would strongly urge the fixed dollar amount for two reasons. In the first place, a percentage increase in a salary formula is usually inequitable. A 10 per cent increase in salary to a man earning $10,000 a year will provide him with $1,000 more pay, whereas a 10 per cent increase to a man earning $40,000 a year will provide him with $4,000 more in pay. Assuming that during the period in question the cost of living rose by 15 per cent, the net result is that the man earning $10,000 a year will be $500 short of what he needs to keep him abreast of the cost of living, whereas the man earning $40,000 a year will be $2,000 to 2,500 better off.

An Hon. Senator: Don't forget income tax.

Senator Manning: I have not forgotten income tax. That is a factor which applies across the board, with respect to all incomes.

In addition to what I have said, the low income man must spend practically all his income on living expenses, and probably still has to go into debt, whereas the higher salaried man, given the same percentage increase, in most cases, is put into the position where he can devote the greater part of increased earnings to savings or investments. One thing which we do not take into account in this present high interest rate period is the tremendous difference, financially, between the man who has $1,000 to invest and the man who has to borrow $1,000 in order to maintain his livelihood. The man who has to borrow $1,000 is probably paying 12 per cent interest, and the man who is able to invest $1,000 will earn in the area of 11 per cent, making an actual difference of 22 or 23 per cent as between the two individuals.

When it comes to the indemnities of members of Parliament, a fixed dollar increase is much more to be desired than a percentage increase, having regard to the impact of percentage patterns on wage and salary negotiations across the country as a whole. Most people are bound to take the position that if members of Parliament can justify a certain percentage increase, then they, too, are entitled to at least the same percentage, if not more. This percentage concept is extended into so many areas that the consequences are becoming very serious.

Let me deal first with the general principle of the bill before us. Last evening Senator Lawson made two very pertinent points. First, he pointed out that it is wholly irrelevant to relate compensation for services rendered by members of Parliament, or anyone else for that matter, to pensions paid to senior citizens or other recipients of social benefits. That is a point the media has grossly misrepresented across the country. The two things are wholly unrelated. I am all in favour of higher pensions for senior citizens and disabled citizens who are in need of greater social assistance. What we are dealing with in this bill is not social assistance. We are dealing here with compensation for services rendered, and that is a different matter altogether.

The second point made by Senator Lawson was when he exposed the political hypocrisy of parties and individuals who condone without question unconscionable salary and indemnity increases in provincial legislatures when it is their party that makes the increase, but who turn around and condemn the Government of Canada, because it is of a different political persuasion, when it proposes an increase at the federal level. There is no place for that kind of politicking on a subject of this importance.

Nevertheless, I cannot agree with Senator Lawson's conclusion that this is an appropriate bill for Parliament to pass at this time. I feel I owe it to this chamber to state frankly why this is so. May I say first of all that I regret, as I am sure many honourable senators regret, the steady erosion in this country of the earlier concept of public service. There was a time when men went into Parliament or into the civil service primarily because they wanted to be in a field of public service; they did not go into it because it was going to provide a high income. They were motivated by their interest in people, and the hope that they might be able to do something worthwhile to help people.

I know that can be carried to extremes and am not suggesting that we should have a system under which men prepared to go into public service should be asked to give their time freely, or for meagre compensation. I simply say that I regret to see the passing of an era in which the concept of public service was an opportunity to serve people. More and more that concept is giving way to the idea that we should equate remuneration in public service with what is available in the private sector.

This has not only happened with respect to parliamentarians. It has happened to an even greater degree, in the last ten or fifteen years, in the civil service. I can recall a period when one of the concerns of government was the constant raiding of the public service by private industry, which could take good people away from the public service quite easily because the rate of remuneration in the private sector was so much better than in the public sector. Today we have the reverse position. Today the private sector is losing some of its best people to the public sector, because of the increased rates of pay for senior civil servants.

As was stated by the Leader of the Opposition today and by Senator Lawson yesterday, approximately 1,000 civil servants here in Ottawa are drawing over $60,000 a year. I am not in a position to say that these men are not worth that amount of money, but it indicates the very significant change that has taken place in the last 15 years. The same thing is now taking place in the field of elected representatives, and it is held that their compensation should be equal to or greater than what a man can make in the private sector. Some of that thinking undoubtedly lies behind this present legislation.

Be that as it may, honourable senators, far more serious, and what concerns me most about Bill C-44, is what is happening across Canada at this very time while we have this legislation under consideration. I agree with the Leader of the Government, and I have been long enough in public life to know that there is no good time to pass legislation such as this. The only thing you can hope for at best is that some times are not quite as bad as other times. This country today is in grave economic trouble, and as parliamentarians we have to be among the first to recognize that fact.

The indicators of economic growth, or lack of growth, almost without exception, tell us that economic conditions will get worse before we turn the corner. If and when we do turn that corner, we are certainly in for a long, slow and painful haul back. In light of the economic outlook, we have to assume that unemployment in this country will continue to increase for at least another year. Inflation is still running rampant. The prospect of inflation in Canada being brought under control in the near future is remote indeed. It may be slowed a little, but there certainly is no indication that it is under control. My plea is that we be honest with the Canadian people, and not give them the false impression that by merely appealing for voluntary restraints, we can bring under control this insidious thing that is destroying the life savings of hundreds of thousands of people, and making it extremely difficult for those on low incomes to get by.

Under present circumstances, everybody is scrambling to get a bigger piece of what is daily becoming a smaller pie, for our actual productivity is not increasing. The GNP dollar figures are misleading, because to a large extent they merely reflect the results of this inflation to which I refer. We are faced with a situation in which the economic pie is shrinking rather than increasing, and everybody is scrambling to get a bigger piece of a smaller pie.

This mad scramble is reflected in the excessive wage demands made in the latter part of last year, and the early part of this year, not only by organized labour but by almost all segments of society. We all know that this is pushing up at an alarming rate the cost of almost everything that people have to buy, both goods and services.

The plea I make, honourable senators, is that we give leadership in helping the people of Canada realize that a high price level is to everybody's disadvantage. It is far better to have a lower level of salaries and incomes and a lower price level, where the dollar will buy more goods, than to have an inflated price level such as we face today.

Senator Greene: I wonder if the honourable gentleman can advise me whether he is advocating wage and price controls.

Senator Manning: No, I am not recommending price and wage controls. I do not believe they have worked anywhere and I do not believe they would work in Canada, except in a time of emergency such as war.

What I am advocating is that members of Parliament help the people of this country to realize that the ultimate end of the course we are pursuing, in pushing prices higher, is not going to achieve the results people are looking for. Nobody is going to benefit. We are rapidly pricing ourselves out of our export markets, especially on this continent, and if we keep on we will destroy thousands of jobs in Canada in the months ahead. How is that going to help the wage earner? It is fine to say we have jacked up wages 50 or 60 per cent. But what good does that do if the jobs disappear? That would be one of the inevitable results of the excessive high price levels into which we are moving so rapidly at the present time.

Honourable senators have seen the recent quarterly figures with respect to Canada's balance of payments. It is the biggest deficit in our balance of payments in history. How long can that go on? If we continue to pursue a course which pushes our costs higher and higher every month, that balance of payments deficit is going to get larger and larger, as we price ourselves out of more and more markets.

You all know who gets hurt the worst. It is not honourable senators or members of the other place, and it is not business executives; it is the low-income people of this country, because they are the ones who do not have financial reserves. I am not talking about organized labour. Organized labour is able to look after itself very well—better in many cases than management and salaried executives. No, I am talking about the hundreds of thousands of wage earners who are not organized, the thousands of small business people who are trying to eke out a living under conditions which make it increasingly more difficult each passing month. These are the people who get hurt when we keep on jacking up prices to higher and higher levels.

I suggest, honourable senators, that this is the context in which we have to consider the appropriateness at a time like this of increasing the sessional indemnities and expenses for members of Parliament. It is not the dollars represented by this particular increase that I am worried about. We are only talking about 350 people in the two houses. In relation to the Canadian economy that is an insignificant drop in the bucket. What I am worried about is that when the elected members of Parliament—to whom the Canadian people should be able to look for leadership in bringing to a halt this clamour after more and more income, resulting in higher and higher prices—themselves join in the clamour, their action will be reflected in almost every wage settlement made during the next year across this country.

I recall the occasion when the government intervened some years ago in a seaway wage settlement. The representative of an industry participating in a wage settlement going on at the time told me that they had reached an agreement and were in the process of tidying up the arrangements, when someone in the room turned on the radio to get the evening news. When the newscast gave the amount of the settlement to which the government had agreed, the union representative tore up the contract and said, "Boys, it is a new ballgame. Let's start all over again."

Well, that is understandable. It is the natural chain effect that I suggest is desperately serious. I know the counter-arguments. We can ask, "Why should parliamentarians be the ones to exercise particular restraint? They haven't had an increase for four years. Their costs have gone up." These are all valid arguments. If we could look at this matter of indemnity increase in that limited context, I would not be standing here today. It has been long my thought that society is pretty warped in its sense of values when it comes to the matter of compensation for those it asks to be its representatives. I have difficulty understanding why people in the media or the entertainment world or the sports world should be paid three, four, five or ten times as much as we pay the people who are charged with the responsibility of running our country. But leaving aside all of these arguments, valid as most of them are, the fact remains that the people of Canada must be able to look to those whom they have elected for leadership in a time of economic crisis, which in my view is what we are facing in this country today.

Let me add a word about indexing. It is necessary to have some means of looking after future legitimate increases, and the indexing method proposed in this bill is suggested for that reason. My contention is that the last group in Canada that should have their compensation indexed, either to the cost of living or to the industrial composite index, are members of Parliament. In a sense it almost gives them a vested interest in continuing inflation. They are the very people who should constantly be made aware that they are here to bring inflation under control, not to qualify for further wage increases when inflation pushes prices to a higher level.

I am all in favour, as I have indicated, of a fixed dollar increase being put into the statute to become effective at the commencement of each new Parliament. But I say to you again that if there is one group in Canada whose increased compensation should not be geared to the cost of living index, or to the industrial composite index, it is those whom the people have elected to manage their economy in a way that will safeguard the interests of the people as a whole.

I have heard it said often in this house that the people of Canada do not understand the role of the Senate. I agree. They do not appreciate the efforts this house makes in their interests. I have found since I have come here that members of this house are sincerely dedicated to the public interest. Honourable senators, if we want once and for all to bring to the attention of the Canadian public the validity of our claim that we are looking after their interests, then let us reject this legislation. If we do so, it will make the headlines of every newspaper in Canada and will be heard in every news broadcast and television newscast inside three hours. There would be no doubt left in anyone's mind as to what the Senate had done on this occasion.

Senator Flynn: That's right. They would think we were crazy.

Senator Manning: I am satisfied that it would have the overwhelming endorsement of the great majority of the Canadian people, if we had the will to do it. If we have not the will to reject the legislation for the sake of those who labour in the other place, I submit we could at least do it for ourselves.

I come back to a point raised by Senator Godfrey in a different context. I, too, have considered this question of whether there should be a differential in indemnity for members of this house and members of the other place. To be quite honest, my conclusion is that there should be a differential. I know all the arguments about time given to committee work, and I am all in favour of those men who give their time on committees when this house is not sitting, being paid for the extra time which they give. But I do not think we can successfully argue that the Senate, which normally sits one evening and two days a week—in contrast to the other place which normally sits five days a week and quite often several evenings—can be considered comparable with the House of Commons from a standpoint of the demands on our time. This is especially true when we take into account that a member of an elected house has all the demands imposed on his time by constituents, and also the problem of maintaining his contacts with his constituency with a view to being re-elected. This does not apply to us, and it would be difficult to make a valid argument that the demands on our time are equal to those of an elected representative.

Normally, in fixing compensation and in negotiations for wage and salary adjustments, one of the factors taken into account is security of tenure. The argument often used as to why men and women should be willing to work in the civil service for less than they would in the private sector is that they have security of tenure to a greater extent. I think there is validity in that argument. Honourable senators, we have to admit that we certainly have more security of tenure in this house than they do in the other place. We do not have to go back and seek re-election every four years.

I do not want to belabour this matter further, but in my honest opinion there is valid argument that the compensation paid to members of the Senate should be less than the compensation paid to the members of the other place. If we are not prepared to reject this bill, I would hope that there might be a willingness to reject the proposed increases in our own case, and thereby establish the differential in compensation which is justified.

When they introduced this bill in the other place the first time, it called for a 50 per cent raise. As a result of the adverse public reaction they had serious second thoughts, and reduced the increase to one-third before the bill even came to this chamber. I suggest, in this case, we should have a serious third thought instead of the usual serious second thought, and either reject this bill entirely or else, at least, as I have proposed, reject the indemnity increase as it applies to us.

I do not like using personal illustrations, but in closing I will tell you one thing that has been on my mind since this bill was introduced. If it passes, I will find myself in the position of being paid, for sitting in this house one evening and two days a week, considerably more money than I was paid in salary and indemnity combined as Premier of the Province of Alberta after 33 consecutive years in government, 25 of them as premier, during which time I always carried one, and sometimes two, additional portfolios. There is very little comparison between that load of work and responsibility and that involved in serving in this house. I know that this was six and a half years ago, but the changes that have taken place in that interval certainly do not justify an increase of the order proposed in Bill C-44.

These are the reasons, honourable senators, why I cannot in good conscience support this legislation.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of Senator Manning, not on the substance of his message—on which I may have something more to say later on—but about his attitude of doom and gloom concerning the short-term economic situation as it is at this stage. Could he give me an example of any major and significant indicator which has not gone up in the last few months in this country?

Senator Manning: One example that comes to mind is the further continued decline in housing starts. That has always been regarded as one of the major indicators.

Senator Lamontagne: It is going up.

Senator Manning: The paper this morning said that it was down 25 per cent.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I think I would be doing a little less than my duty to myself, if not to you, if I were not to rise at this time.

I had the opportunity to be in the Alberta Legislature where Senator Manning was bringing forward increases of his own at a time when he was Leader of the Government and I was Leader of the Opposition. At that time I had the common decency to acknowledge that I was going to get the raise, because they had 54 seats, and I had four. In those circumstances I felt it was my responsibility to stand up and say what I believed, and that was that we were damn well earning every cent that we were going to get. I remember that I was a little annoyed with what was then the CCF, who were doing what the NDP are doing today—that is, standing up and deploring the fact that we were going to take what they were going to get by our taking it. This makes for a little confusion, but I think we should get the record straight. I do not have directors' fees from any banks, airlines or steel companies. I do not expect to get them, and this kind of talk is hardly apt to get them for me.

However, let me say that there used to be a joke going around that the definition of a junior executive was a fellow with a couple of university degrees who did not have brains enough to ask for overtime. If any senator, or any member of the other place, thinks he will get any credit from constituents by not asking for more money, when he is sure in his own mind that he damn well earns it, he is crazy. They will give him no thanks for it; they will only say, "Well, the guy is as stupid as I thought he was anyhow."

I have no qualms of conscience about cashing my cheque. Perhaps we do only sit in the house on Tuesday night and Wednesday and Thursday afternoons, but we also do committee work. However, because there are 90 of us instead of 270, because we do not have to waste any time listening to speeches that are made entirely for the voters back home, because we can get on with business and complete it, we do exactly the same amount of work as members of the other place do in a third of the time. We do the same amount of work and have the same output as they do and, damn it, we earn the same salary. That is what we do, and we do a lot more besides. We read the same bills and the same number of bills; we have to understand the same number of paragraphs and the same number of phrases; and we have to keep ourselves informed on exactly the same number of subjects. These things take time, and we keep ourselves better informed than they do because we have that time.

I think there has been enough nonsense and enough hypocrisy about this business of better pay for parliamentarians. You never get paid what you are worth, but you should be paid enough to make it possible for you to go into public life without having to ask your family to make unwarranted sacrifices. That is simply it. The salaries we are getting today are those of the lower middle-income class, and that is all. Let us make no mistake about it. Let us make no apologies for it. Let us just wonder why we did not have guts enough to go ahead and take the 50 per cent that we should have taken in the first place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think we all appreciate the conscientious contributions to this debate which have been made from all parts of the house. There appears to be a consensus that this matter should be brought to a second reading vote.

Senator Manning stated a few moments ago that because of the great economic troubles we are facing Parliament should defer any increase. There are, however, other grave economic troubles. For example, there are the grave economic troubles of a member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place with five children, who has two mortgages—one in Ottawa and one in his constituency—with living costs totalling hundreds of dollars a month, who could not pay his income tax at the end of last month. He wrote a letter stating that if an increase came through he would endeavour to make time-payments on his tax. He does not have any directorships. He has no other source of income. This person, who is not of my party, came to me. He is in desperate financial straits, with a $6,000 loan from the bank.

That, honourable senators, constitutes grave economic trouble. It constitutes grave economic trouble for any hard-working member of this place, or of the other place—and there are many of them—who are faced with the considerable burden of maintaining two residences—one at home and one here in Ottawa. The conscientious hard-working people of the other place and the conscientious hard-working people of this place are faced with very high living costs. We know this, the people on the Hill know this, and the people in the gallery know this. And these grave economic troubles facing some members, are troubles which are here and now. They cannot be postponed; they cannot be delayed temporarily by members going to a "friendly" finance company.

Coincidentally, honourable senators, this morning I was given a list of salary requests which have been received from those working in the food retailing industry in the province of British Columbia. Compare the indemnities of parliamentarians with these requests, and you will see that at the present time the check-out operators at some Canadian supermarkets now get, including their fringe benefits, $14,711 a year. They are asking in their present contract negotiation a total package equivalent to $23,851. Those are the check-out operators. The journeyman meat cutters, presently receiving $18,887, are asking this year for a package of $31,624. The doughmen in the bakery—and bread prices are going to go up—presently receive an annual salary of $12,607. Fringe benefits bring it to a total of $17,040. They are asking now an annual salary of $18,964 with almost $10,000 in fringe benefits, for a total of $28,266. These are the figures—and some suggest that MPs' indemnities are "out of line!" And we were advised this afternoon that the situation is so grave in the country that the people who are supposed to be members of the highest court in the land must defer any requests until some future date. By the way, I forgot to mention that the head meat cutters at some Canadian supermarkets are asking for a total package of $33,524.

Perhaps these people deserve these increases—and I am not in the process of labour negotiations with them—but I do happen to know that parliamentarians have to spend the same amount for groceries and the same amount for rent. As a matter of fact, they have to spend twice as much for rent as those in other parts of the community. These are the inexorable economic facts which afflict the lives of members of Parliament, and make it extremely difficult for some of them to continue to serve.

There are some members of the other place, as there are some members of this house, who have independent means; they have other sources of income. But surely we do not want to create out of either House of Parliament an exclusive club based on economic advantage. Surely we want to create in both places an arena where people can aspire to serve the public and not be concerned about their family tree or their economic tree or considerations which should not be part of the vocation of public service.

There have been other arguments advanced. I was glad to hear our colleague from the province of Alberta, Senator Prowse, mention one salient fact, that the 92 members of this house are doing work similar to that done by the 263 members of the other place, and with less partisan disputation. But merely to quote statistics and to say that this house meets half as often as the other place is not an adequate explanation of our parliamentary role, nor does it give a fair picture of what the Senate is all about. One could just as well do the same kind of statistical analysis and say, "Well, you know, in 1968 the House of Commons sat on 118 occasions, and because there are only one-third as many senators the Senate should have met only 39 times." In fact, the Senate met 66 times. But what does that prove? What does that playing around with figures really demonstrate? It does not demonstrate anything at all. One can go through this kind of arithmetic endlessly. Some so-called attendance figures may appear in your favourite newspaper tomorrow—and it will be possible to question and refute every one of them.

The efficiency and the efficacy of any chamber is measured by the results which it obtains for the people of the country, and by any test the Senate can be analyzed and certainly will not be found wanting. Look at the accelerated degree of activity which has taken place in this place over recent months. Look at the increased committee activity. How do you measure the efforts of senators to communicate with the regions they represent? Should we equip every senator with a pedometer or time-clock to assess the effort which he expends to represent properly the regional interests? And that, honourable senators, is one of our important tasks. The Fathers of Confederation brought this house into existence because the people of the Maritimes were concerned about the overwhelming number of elected members from Ontario and Quebec, and they wanted to make sure that regional interests were preserved and maintained. I know that senators—or most of them at any rate—do an excellent job in their own regions, and make sure that the problems of those regions are brought to the attention of those in Ottawa.

You cannot put a time-clock on that kind of thing. You cannot put a time-clock on the number of unemployment insurance claims handled by senators, and the school graduations which are attended, the young people helped, or the war veterans' allowances which are processed because of the efforts of senators. We all do those things, and we do not seek that kind of service itemized and rewarded, but neither do we want some sort of infantile statistical analysis purporting to reflect the supposed activity or inactivity in this place. Such statistical analysis is inaccurate and unfair.

Honourable senators, I do not want this measure to suffer from "overkill," but I did want to state to you it is my view that on balance it is the most adequate measure that can be advanced at this time for the greatest good of those who serve in Parliament, and for that reason I would urge your support on second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Perrault, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

FARM CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Argue for adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on Bill C-34, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise to speak very briefly and indicate that I support the motion for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. I do so because in my opinion a somewhat important principle is involved. After all, this committee studied the bill in detail—studied, I know, with great care—and it was studied by the members having a good knowledge of the subject.

The report recommends that the bill be amended to change the age requirement from 35 to 40 years. In my opinion, the Senate should not reject a report of a committee unless in the most extraordinary circumstances. I can visualize a committee, such as the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, reporting a number of such bills during this session, and if the report in this case were rejected I am sure it would constitute a great discouragement to the members of the committee. How would they know that in studying future bills and recommending amendments the chamber would back them up? Therefore I do not think that such reports should be rejected unless, as I said, there are most extraordinary circumstances involved.

In this case I must say that I have not heard any convincing argument against the proposed amendment. True, it has been stated that young people under the age of 35 should be given the higher loan in order that they be encouraged to enter agriculture. However, nothing has been forthcoming to indicate that by increasing the age limit to 40 years, those under 35 would be injured or hurt in any way. If it was a case in which there was only a certain amount of money to be loaned, and the age limit increase would cause those under the age of 35 to do with less, there would be some logic in it. Up to the present time I have not heard that there is any such danger. It would, therefore, seem to me that by increasing the age limit to 40 we would assist those between 35 and 40 years of age, and not injure those under 35 years of age in any way whatsoever.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I support the motion for adoption of the committee's report.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am sure that many of you will be surprised that I should be speaking with respect to this bill since I do not claim to be a farmer, although I have had some continuing association with that activity throughout my lifetime. In listening to the debate on the motion for the adoption of this report of the committee I found myself at first perplexed by what I thought to be an omission in the argument, and later very much troubled by it, and I draw this to the attention of honourable senators.

The purpose of the bill, of course, is an excellent one, and in my opinion there is general agreement in that regard. It provides many needed reforms or improvements to the legislation. The report of the committee is, in general, in exactly the same category.

I must say that I am one of those who are very happy that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has been revived, and I commend the excellent work it has carried on. I wish to make it very clear that I can only commend the work of that committee, and I hope that anything I say now will not be interpreted by any of its members as a reflection on their work or as any reproof of it. My concern is that, in my opinion, the Senate is inadvertently stumbling into a very awkward situation.

When this bill was in the other place the matter was discussed at some length. This was done after the committee of the other place reported the bill back to the whole house in accordance with their due procedures. At that stage, when the report of the committee was being considered, an amendment similar to that proposed by the committee in this place was put forward. It had not been put forward in the committee of the other place, but when the committee reported an amendment was put forward which was identical in effect to that proposed by our committee. That amendment would have changed the eligible age provided in the relevant clause from 35 to 40 years, and was rejected by the House of Commons. As I see it, the Senate, without the point having been raised or discussed here, would be rushing headlong, if it adopts this report, into sending back to the House of Commons an amendment—I shall make some reference to its importance in a few moments—which does not go to the heart of the bill at all and raises no question of principle, and which the other place has recently voted to reject. Surely that is not the type of ground on which the Senate should be choosing to seek a confrontation with the House of Commons.

Senator Flynn: Shades of James Coyne.

Senator McLraith: In my view, we should consider this rather more carefully. The report of the committee, as I have said, I regard as an excellent report and, if I may presume on your time for a moment, I will indicate what it sets forth.

Its first effect is to change the age limit from 35 to 40 years in two or three clauses of the bill. That is an amendment to the bill itself.

The report then makes several recommendations which do not constitute changes in the bill itself. Those recommendations are in the nature of an attempt to introduce more vigour into the administration of the act and recommend to government consideration certain changes in the monetary limits, thus making the act more beneficial and advantageous to, particularly, young farmers. All in all, I consider it to be a report which in what it seeks to do would commend itself to most honourable senators on both sides of the house. However, the consequences of what we are doing are such that in my opinion they should be thoroughly considered before we take any such step.

• (1610)

I noted—and I can be corrected if I am wrong—that in discussing the report and the proposed change, the honourable senators who spoke seemed to agree that the age limit of 35 was an arbitrary one. It may well be that it is too low; it may well be that it should be 40. In any event, the point is that for that extra benefit, given under the clauses which are called in question, the arbitrary age limit of 35 was chosen. One could argue that it should have been 40, 34, 37, or any other figure, but by the nature of the legislation it had to be an arbitrary figure. So there is no question—

Senator Asselin: You are not discussing the merit; you are discussing the procedure?

Senator McLraith: I am discussing the procedure. The point is, we are not concerned with a question of principle. We are concerned with a confrontation on a point that is not a matter of principle—namely, as to whether it should be 35 or 40. It may well be that it should be 40. I do not know. That is the point I wanted to make.

Senator Norrie: May I ask a question?

Senator McLraith: Certainly.

Senator Norrie: Is there much difference from the bill, as you read it, that was passed a few weeks ago?

Senator McLraith: I will give the honourable senator the exact reference. It is rather interesting.

Senator Norrie: Was the bill reworded in a different way, or are there any items that are different?

Senator McLraith: No, not in the amendment. The exact wording is to be found at page 4683 of the House of Commons Debates of Thursday, April 10. The amendment moved reads as follows:

That Bill C-34, an act to amend the Farm Credit Act, be amended by deleting the words "thirty-five" in lines 42 and 48 at page 2, lines 3 and 12 at page 3, line 38 at page 7 and line 22 at page 8, and substituting therefor the word "forty".

In other words, it is the identical point raised by the Senate committee. That was rejected by the other place, after a rather short debate, and the bill was given third reading.

If the report is adopted in its present form, it seems to me that we shall have a confrontation with the House of Commons, which has taken a decision on this point. It is not a question of principle. They have two courses of action: they either accept our amendment or reject it. If they accept it, what will be involved? I cannot tell honourable senators how long it will take for the other place to receive our message and to have the matter brought before the house. In any event, if they accept it, we are risking a delay of a few more weeks. If they reject it, we shall be faced with a confrontation that will ultimately cause still more delay before the bill is returned.

As I understand the situation, there are a great many applications—I could not get the exact number—under this section of the act still to be dealt with, and which will not be dealt with until the bill is passed. Delay in passage of this legislation is of real consequence, I am told, to a considerable number of young farmers. I have been unable to ascertain the number definitively. I merely tell honourable senators what I have been advised.

Secondly, it is my understanding—although I personally did not receive a telegram—that there is a very large protest on the part of farmers, not necessarily against this place but against the government or Parliament, against our not passing the bill immediately. There are other things in the bill which they want. They want the bill passed. The protests were described by one source as a deluge.

That being so, I respectfully suggest, particularly to the members of the committee, that a better method would be to amend the report, by an appropriate motion, deleting the amendment to the bill but retaining everything else. That would be a course of wisdom and effective action on the part of this chamber at this time, and would be perfectly consistent with the committee's seeking to bring whatever pressure it can to bear on the government to amend the section in question. It would not prejudice such action, and would avoid the adverse consequences arising from any delay in the passage of this legislation. It would also avoid a confrontation on something which is not a question of principle. I believe that to be the correct course of action.

I therefore move, in amendment:

That the report be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out the first three paragraphs thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred Bill C-34 intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act," has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, April 22, 1975, examined the said bill and now reports the same, without amendment, but with the following recommendations:"

All the recommendations contained in the report would be included. The effect would be to strike out the amendment to the clause and to substitute the words "without amendment but with the following recommendations." It changes the language a little, but has the effect of preserving the whole of the report with the exception of the part amending the bill.

Honourable senators, I hope that course of action commends itself to this house, and that it is of assistance to the work of the committee, which I believe was done without full knowledge, or indeed any knowledge, of the fact that the point had been raised in the other place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on Bill C-34, an act to amend the Farm Credit Act, be now adopted.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., that the report be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out the first three paragraphs thereof and substituting therefor the following—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

[Senator McIlraith.]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

Hon. Allister Grosart: On a point of order, honourable senators, there is a serious question as to whether the amendment is in order. Unfortunately our rules do not specifically deal with this question. There is, however, a statement at page 126 of our rule book—in that part of our rules described as Forms and Proceedings—in which—

Senator Langlois: I am pleased to hear you say that.

Senator Grosart: I will comment on that also. I say for the consideration of the Senate that these Forms and Proceedings, formerly known as Forms of Proceedings, have been revised in accordance with the present practice, and are included as an appendix to the Rules of the Senate pursuant to the order of the Senate dated December 10, 1968.

The Deputy Leader of the Government said he was glad to hear me say that. The reason for that is that on other occasions, as I do on this occasion, I have questioned the authority of these Forms and Proceedings, unless they are backed up by something more than merely a recital, an opinion at some time or other, by whoever prepared them. There is nothing in the resolution of December 10, 1968, to say that these Forms and Proceedings have the authority of rules. That is the stand I have taken in the past, and I take it again.

Senator Langlois: Read rule 1 now.

Senator Grosart: At pages 124 and 126 of the English version we find a discussion of the way in which the Senate may deal with a report of a committee where an amendment has been proposed to a bill. I might say that rules 78, 79, 80, 81 and 82 specifically refer to reports of committees on bills.

Perhaps I should read the final paragraph on page 124. It is as follows:

A report from a committee may be referred back to it for reconsideration. After the motion for adoption of the report has been moved, a senator may move, in amendment, as follows:

That the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the... Committee for further consideration;

OR

That the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to the said committee to amend the bill as follows: ... to strike out certain words or to amend it in any respect.

The authority given for that is Senate Journals, 1968-69, page 734, and 1955, page 488.

I shall leave out the next paragraph, which is not relevant. It goes on to state:

The Senate may not amend a report from a select committee but may refer the report back to the said committee or to the committee of the whole.

When a report of a committee recommends changes in the rules, that is another matter.

We have the statement that the Senate "may not amend a report from a select committee." That is clearly the considered opinion of whoever looked at the rules and revised them, and the Senate agreed that this should be made an appendix to the rules.

I am sorry to say that I have not had an opportunity to look up the authority for this statement. It is said to be in the Senate Journals at the places I have cited. I would suggest that this matter be disposed of by way of a ruling from the Chair on my point of order before we agree to the question being put, or to the matter being discussed further.

I am not saying that this is the rule, but certainly when we have the statement that the Senate "may not amend a report from a select committee" in our rule book, whatever the authority may be, we should have a ruling from the Chair as to whether it is proper for the Senate, under our rules and proceedings and usages, to amend a report of a committee.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to reply to the point of order. I have read the reference by Senator Grosart to pages 124 and 126 of the red book, Rules of the Senate, specifically Appendix II to our rules which, as I understand it, has no validity whatsoever. It is merely an appendix. The statement read by Senator Grosart is:

The Senate may not amend a report from a select committee but may refer the report back to the said committee or to the committee of the whole.

And then there are some references given. I have before me those references, and they support no such proposition. The first one will be found in the Journals of the Senate of October 31, 1968, at page 301. It states as follows:

The Honourable Senator Molson, from the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate, presented the Third Report of the aforementioned Special Committee.

The Honourable Senator Molson moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang, that the Report be referred to a Committee of the Whole for consideration on Wednesday next, 6th November, 1968.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

There is nothing in that to say that it must be referred back at all. He could have moved that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Finance, or any other committee. It just does not deal with the point at all.

The other alleged authority is to be found at page 500 of the Journals of the Senate of December 10, 1968, and it reads as follows:

The Order of the Day being called for consideration of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate,

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Molson moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That the consideration of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate be postponed until Thursday next, 12th December, 1968, but that the Schedule thereto containing a proposed revision of the Rules of the Senate be referred to a Committee of the Whole for consideration forthwith.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

It will be seen that those are examples of a report being referred to a Committee of the Whole. They do not in any way deal with the matter read by myself and Senator Grosart from page 126 of the Rules of the Senate.

I have other references in support of my proposition. I wish I had been able to get at it a little earlier than a quarter of two this afternoon.

I should like to give honourable senators two further examples of the Senate's doing what we are seeking to do today. The first will be found in Journals of the Senate of 1946 at page 413. It reads as follows:

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to the Bill (193), intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act."

The Honourable Senator Beauregard moved that the said amendments be now concurred in.

In amendment, the Honourable Senator Hugessen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Howard, moved that the said amendments be not now concurred in but that they be amended by striking out the amendments numbered four and five.

That is precisely what we are seeking to do by the motion, in amendment, I have put forward.

The other precedent is to be found in the Journals of the Senate of 1955, at page 223. It states as follows:

The Honourable Senator Hugessen, from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to whom was referred the Bill (Q-6), intituled: "An Act respecting The London and Port Stanley Railway Company and the Corporation of the City of London", reported that they had gone through the said Bill, and had directed him to report the same to the Senate with one amendment, which he was ready to submit whenever the Senate would be pleased to receive the said amendment.

The said amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows:—

I will not bother reading the amendment. Continuing:

The said amendment was concurred in.

I am sorry, that is not directly on the point at issue. I do have a further one—

Senator Grosart: One is enough.

Senator McIlraith: I have been informed that there are many precedents where amendments have been made by the Senate to motions to adopt a report of a committee.

Senator Grosart: I thank Senator McIlraith for clearing up, first of all, the matter of the references to the Journals which, as he says, refer only to the right of the Senate to refer a report of a Senate committee to the Committee of the Whole. I agree with him entirely on that. I also have no objection to the precedent he has cited for amendment of the report of a committee in the Senate. In fact, to me it makes perfect sense that the Senate should be able to amend the report of a committee.

On the other hand, I am still disturbed by this statement, and I would urge that we have a ruling from the Chair on it. If it does nothing else, it will once and for all, or at least for the time being, determine whether we are going to pay any attention to these 62 pages in the back of this book. I have argued before that we should not, that they should not be in the book, and I know that in the revision of the rules now being undertaken this matter is being considered, because Senator Molson has told me so. I hope we will get rid of them altogether.

I am not objecting in any way to the case made by Senator McIlraith for the right of the Senate. However, I hope we will have an official ruling so that we will know whether we are to pay any attention to these pages in the book. If the ruling is that the Senate may amend, then surely it puts every line in these Forms and Proceedings under suspicion, because they say, as clearly as anything can, that the Senate may not amend a report from a committee.

I raise the point merely so that we can have this matter settled. I think it wise that it should be settled. I raise it so that we can get some kind of ruling on whether we are to pay any attention to these 62 pages, on which we spend money when we amend our rules, or whether we are to revise them again.

Senator Langlois: I hope the honourable senator is not expecting a ruling today.

Senator Grosart: No.

Senator Flynn: I hope Her Honour will understand that the point of order has been raised in order that it can be rejected.

The Hon. the Speaker: Having listened to the debate, I will take the question under advisement and give a decision later. Do honourable senators wish to continue the debate?

Hon. Harry Hays: May I speak on the amendment?

Senator Grosart: There has to be a ruling.

Senator Hays: I understood I could speak on the amendment.

Senator Hicks: You cannot speak on the amendment. You may speak on the main motion, and you have already done so.

Senator McIlraith: The honourable senator may proceed, with the consent of the Senate, to advance his argument so that no more time will be lost.

Senator Grosart: Not with consent, but with leave.

Senator McIlraith: With leave of the Senate, the honourable senator can be heard.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Flynn: It is a practice in the other place, when the Speaker takes a point of order under advisement, that the debate continues on the motion.

Senator Argue: He can proceed, but he cannot conclude the debate.

Senator McIlraith: No, he cannot conclude the debate.

Senator Flynn: The question cannot be put.

Senator Hays: May I speak on the amendment?

Senator Argue: No, just speak.

Senator Grosart: On the amendment.

Senator Flynn: On the amendment.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, in speaking on the amendment, may I say that I feel very keenly about the Farm Credit Corporation? I would prefer not to have any age limit at all, because there is nothing sacred about the ages of 35, 40, 45 or 50 years. As we know, in this place we have some people who are close to 90, and who are a lot brighter than young people of 22 or 31.

This afternoon I had an opportunity to speak to the Minister of Agriculture who, together with his officials, was very concerned about the number of people waiting for funds under this bill. I do not think some of the changes were brought out by the officials. For instance, to qualify for the $150,000 a man of 35 years or under does not necessarily have to be a farmer only—he can have two jobs—but after five years he must be a permanent farmer. These things can be put in the bill, and after five years a man may say he is going to be a permanent farmer. What if he succeeds? It sounds good, but it is completely impractical. It seems to me that that part of the bill is unworkable because it is not practical.

I appreciate that there are many people who are anxious to know whether they come within the $150,000 category or the $100,000 category, according to whether they purchase 400 acres of land or perhaps 300 acres of land.

The minister also assured me that this would be a one-year trial, but that was not brought out in committee. I do not know whether it is the fault of the chairman of our committee, or of the Farm Credit Corporation, and I think the minister should have been there. This Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is a very important committee—much more important than people in the other place, or even the officials, realize. The members of the committee are active, and they are going to change legislation from time to time if it is ill-considered legislation.

I believe that more preparation should have gone into this legislation. The whole concept of farming today, including the Farm Credit Corporation, should be oriented, as happens in other countries, towards a financial institution that will make it possible for consumers to enjoy the same cheap good food that they have had for the last 25 or 30 years.

There should be a place in our society for farmers to be financed properly over a long period of time. I would not object to having amortization over 50 years, with a roll-over, so that the farmer's son is able to take over from his father if the payments have not been completed. Today people change their homes three times in a lifetime, and none of them is ever paid for. They have pride of ownership, but probably never have any more than 30 or 40, or at best 60, per cent equity; somebody else has the equity. This is our system today, and it is a good system, but it seems to me that farmers are denied the opportunity of participating in this sort of society.

If Her Honour the Speaker allows the amendment, I will move an amendment to the amendment, proposing that this report be sent back to the committee, and that the Minister of Agriculture and those of his officials immediately concerned attend, so that we can take a really good look at the Farm Credit Corporation, and know exactly where we are going.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I wish to say that it had been my intention to support the report of the committee, which would have the effect of extending the larger loan limit to farmers up to the age of 40 years. I would support that for the reasons given by Senator Norrie, by Senator Hays in the speech he made previously on this subject, and by Senator Macdonald. I do not need to repeat those arguments, but there are two points that perhaps were not made sufficiently.

I do not think it is true to say, as Senator McDonald said, that farmers are always, or even very often, in the mature and stable position at the age of 35 that he alleged. I think it quite possible that there might be a good many who need a few more years' experience, and that the age of 40 is not too old at which to do this.

Senator McDonald: Would the honourable senator permit a question? What stable position did I allege a farmer was in?

Senator Hicks: My interpretation of the honourable senator's speech was that he felt that by age 35 most farmers should have established their competence as farmers and should have accumulated some capital so that they could ask for the larger loan—that is, the $150,000 loan. But he said that it was not necessary to extend the same argument to persons beyond the age of 35.

Senator McDonald: I think you should read what I said.

Senator Hicks: We can compare the record with what I am saying.

Senator McDonald: I ask you to read what I said.

Senator Hicks: I listened to it.

Senator McDonald: Obviously, you don't hear what you are listening to.

Senator Hicks: I listened to it and I shall eventually read it, but all I can say is that the interpretation I put on the honourable senator's remarks is in substantial agreement with that which many other members of this chamber have held.

Senator McDonald: You did not hear what I said.

Senator Hicks: I did not rise, Madam Speaker, to quarrel with Senator McDonald from Saskatchewan but to make the point, however he placed the argument as applying to persons up to age 35, that it could be extended to persons of age 40. A good many of my colleagues who served their time in World War II were certainly not established to this degree at age 35, but were at age 40.

Furthermore, these loans are carefully scrutinized. I was for some years a practising solicitor representing this federal agency in making loans to farmers in the Annapolis Valley. The loans were carefully scrutinized, the test being whether a person had the kind of prospects—that is, the financial means, the wisdom and the appropriate age—to enable him to handle the repayment of his loan. Such tests are still applied, and I would point out that a farmer at age 40 would still have 20 or 25 years in which to repay his loan, depending on whether you take 60 or 65 as the retirement age. As a matter of fact, my experience and recollection indicate that most loans in Nova Scotia were nowhere near as large as the maximum of $150,000 proposed here. At any rate, my view is that we should extend the age to 40.

Senator McIlraith raised the interesting point that the other place has already rejected exactly the same amendment, and that it would be pointless for us to send the bill back to them amended in a way which they have already refused to accept.

If the amendment is held to be in order, therefore, I would propose to support it and to support the Agriculture Committee in stating what they think are the proper limits, including the age limit, to place on extensions of the provisions of the Farm Credit Act.

I should like to add one caveat. If we did amend this bill—and I agree that it would not be an amendment of much matter or great principle—and then sent it back to the other place, and they rejected our amendment, I would not worry too much about it. I would not call that a confrontation. I do not think that every time this house makes changes in legislation we have to insist that our changes must be accepted by the other place. Our record over the past few years is extraordinarily good. I believe that at the time of the previous debate on this subject, it was pointed out that all of the last 40 or more bills which had been amended by the Senate and sent to the other place had been accepted, except the wiretapping bill of about a year and a half ago. I would not hesitate to amend this bill, therefore, merely because I felt it might not be accepted by the House of Commons.

Senator McIlraith: Would not the honourable senator agree, however, that such a course of action would somewhat delay the final passage of this bill?

Senator Hicks: I was about to mention that. Of my own knowledge I do not know how urgent the handling of this backlog of applications may be, but I accept Senator McIlraith's assurance that there is a backlog and that there are people who urgently want decisions on their applications. While I would not worry too much about the House of Commons not accepting amendments from this place, I would agree that in this case it might introduce a delaying factor, which is perhaps a good reason for our seeking another course of action.

If Senator McIlraith's amendment is not considered in order, I would suggest that we consider sending the bill back to committee for further consideration. For these reasons I propose to support the amendment, if it is in order. Otherwise, I propose to support the adoption of the report of the committee.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: On a point of order, honourable senators, may I suggest that there is a salient fact which has been overlooked. If the amendment ultimately comes before the Senate and is passed in this place, there is every reason to believe that from a procedural point of view it will simply not be accepted by the other place.

Bill C-34 is a money bill and as such it is governed not only by sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act, but also by two important rules of procedure of the other house, namely, Standing Orders 62 and 63. Rule 63, in particular, states in part that:

All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants—

The amendment proposed in the report presented by the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture would have the effect of changing one of the purposes of the bill as stated in the royal recommendation. One of the purposes is:

—to amend the Farm Credit Act to increase the capital of the Corporation . . . by providing for loans to establish young farmers as defined by the Act.

By changing the age of persons eligible for loans under Part IV of Bill C-34, the Senate would, in effect, be changing the meaning of "young farmers" as defined in the bill. The Senate would be, without question, changing a purpose or condition of the bill contrary to Standing Order 63 of the other house, thereby inviting a ruling by the Speaker of the other place that the amendment infringes the privileges of that house and should be laid aside.

At page 207 of the Fourth Edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, it is stated that:

—an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes—

That is precisely what this amendment would do.

—or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge. And this standard is binding not only on private members but also on Ministers whose only advantage is that, as advisors of the Crown, they can present new or supplementary estimates or secure the royal recommendation to new or supplementary resolutions.

In this case the proposed amendment could not be adopted without a new recommendation of the Crown.

Quite apart from the procedural question raised here—and I think that it has real validity—it should be repeated, I think, that a similar amendment was proposed in the other place and was defeated.

We have thousands of young farmers who are now in urgent need of assistance waiting for this chamber to act. I hope we can dispose of this matter.

Senator Hicks: Thousands?

[Senator Hicks.]

Senator Perrault: I am assured by the Minister of Agriculture that there are a great many. I certainly know the representations which have been made to my office.

Senator Hicks: I am not quarrelling with that, honourable senators.

Senator Grosart: May I ask a question on the point of order that has been raised? Was the amendment ruled out of order by the Speaker in the other place?

Senator Langlois: It was defeated.

Senator Grosart: But was it put by the Speaker in the other place? If it was put by the Speaker in the other place, what is the sense of the argument that it could not be put?

Senator McDonald: It is out of order here.

Senator Perrault: We have no power to initiate money bills.

● (1650)

Senator Grosart: But the citation and opinion read by the Leader of the Government was to the effect that it was the exclusive prerogative of the Crown, whether it referred to the Senate or to any ordinary member of the Commons. Hansard will show that that is exactly the point of the quotation that he made. Obviously, if it is so—and I am not arguing that it is not so—whatever limitation there is on the Senate in respect to the prerogative of the Crown is the same limitation that exists on any member of the other place. I am merely asking, if that is so, why was it not ruled out of order? It was put; therefore it must have been in order.

Senator Perrault: May I just reply to that question? Among other things, nobody posed that question in the other place.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, if I might say a few words on the point of order on the question—

Senator Flynn: Which one?

Senator Argue: The one raised about the money bill. Senator Grosart asked about what happened in the other place. It is perfectly true that in the other place, when a similar motion was put, it was in fact put to a vote, and was negatived, so that there was no question raised in the other place. No one can tell me that in the other place, with all the procedural experts there are there, they would for one minute allow this kind of motion to be put if in fact it was out of order.

Senator Langlois: It has been done in the past.

Senator Argue: I really do not think that is the important thing here, because surely the rules that the Senate should follow are the rules of the Senate. The rules governing the Senate must be the rules of the Senate, and not the rules of the House of Commons as applied to the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault has raised a very important question, and I would say he has taken a very serious line. If the Senate should agree that the Senate is unable in any way, shape or form to amend a money bill, or, more precisely, if the Senate is unable in any way to amend a bill which has had the recommendation of the Governor in Council, why send bills to the committee? Why waste our time in committee? Why bring in a report reporting the bill without amendment if the Senate committee has no right to make amendments?

The fact is that over the years dozens, and perhaps hundreds, of times amendments have been made to money bills and sent to the other place. Then the other place either rejects them or accepts them. If they are accepted, they are very often accepted under protest. They do not want a precedent set in the other place, but they accept amendments, nonetheless.

Senator Hayden is in the chamber, and I would suggest that his committee would be most ineffective if he were unable to present to the Senate, and obtain Senate approval of, amendments to bills that have had the recommendation of the Governor in Council. The Senate follows this kind of practice often.

I have before me excerpts from a book entitled The Modern Senate of Canada/1925-1963, A Re-Appraisal, by F. A. Kunz. The author refers, on page 343, to what happened in the case of the Estate Tax Bill of 1958, and I would like to read what he has to say. The bill then in question, of course, was a money bill; that is, a bill that had had the recommendation, and had been presented to the house.

In the case of the Estate Tax bill of 1958 the Senate, in a fine example of party co-operation, did not insist on its amendment to eliminate double taxation of superannuation and pension benefits. However, the interesting thing in this connection was not so much the Senate's retreat as the fact that what the House of Commons objected to in the Senate's action was the merits of the change rather than its constitutionality. The Minister of Finance, in his rebuttal, was concerned with the impracticability of the Senate's proposal, while Mr. Argue, summing up his argument on behalf of the CCF group in the House (which supported the Government in this instance), made the following significant remarks: "I do not for one moment—

They say you should never try to quote yourself, but I am not quoting myself; I am quoting this document.

—"I do not for one moment question . . . the constitutional right of the other place to do such a thing, but I do not think it should be done." The omission of the usual constitutional argument in the Commons' reasoning prompted Mr. Hopkins—

He is our law clerk.

—to say: "It thus appears that the House of Commons no longer takes the rigid view . . . that the Senate cannot amend a money bill in any particular, but must either accept it or reject it in toto."

Now, there are many precedents. I could make a long speech on this, and interfere with Madam Speaker's reception, which I would not wish to do, but I have in my hand something that I might quote from. The following are two of a number of precedents where the Senate has amended a Commons' money bill—that is, a bill that has been first recommended by His Excellency the Governor General.

My first reference is March 10, 1971, Bill C-3, an act respecting investment companies, amended by the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This was passed by the Senate as amended, and the Senate amendments later were agreed to by the Commons.

On October 6, 1971, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce returned Bill C-262—an act to support employment in Canada, by mitigating the disruptive effect on Canadian industry of the imposition of foreign import surtaxes, or other actions of a like effect—with three amendments. The report was adopted, the bill was read a third time and passed as amended. The Senate amendments were later agreed to by the House of Commons.

As senators, apart from our party affiliation and apart from the merits of a given amendment, we must absolutely protect the right of the Senate to bring forward amendments to money bills. We cannot originate a money bill, we cannot propose an increase in taxation, but over the years the Senate, in exercising its duties, has brought forward many amendments to money bills, and many of those amendments—indeed, the vast majority of those amendments—have been accepted by the other house.

Senator Perrault: I would like to draw something to the attention of the honourable senator. On page 28 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada is to be found, in rule 62, the following very explicit statement:

The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

This means an appropriation of extra money. There is no question about it.

Senator Argue: Oh, no.

Senator Grosart: That is exactly what was done very recently, against our opposition here.

Senator Langlois: It was not an appropriation of money.

Senator Grosart: Yes, it was.

Senator Argue: May I continue, honourable senators?

Senator McElman: May I ask Senator Argue a question? With regard to the two citations he has just given, did these affect the money aspect of those bills, or did they affect other detail of the bills?

Senator Flynn: That is the key.

Senator Argue: I would have to give some further consideration to that point, and do some further research.

Senator Grosart: That is the key; but the fact is, they did not.

Senator Argue: This amendment, however, does not increase the expenditure of money for which the government is liable.

I would like to make one further reference. It is to a report of a special committee, entitled: "The Rights of the Senate in Matters of Financial Legislation," dated May 9, 1918, which dealt with precisely the same rule which has been quoted, and which existed in the rule book at that time. I do not want to burden the Senate this afternoon with long quotations, but the Senate itself, in this report, backs up everything I have said, and puts forward the conclusion that the Senate does have these rights. I quote from the conclusions of the chairman, Senator W. B. Ross, as follows:

1. That the Senate of Canada has and always had since it was created, the power to amend Bills originating in the Commons appropriating any part of the revenue or imposing a tax by reducing the amounts therein, but has not the right to increase the same without the consent of the Crown.

A subsequent paragraph states:

5. That Rule 78 of the House of Commons of Canada—

This is rule 63 today.

—claiming for that body powers and privileges in connection with Money Bills identical with those of the Imperial House of Commons is unwarranted under the provisions of The British North America Act, 1867.

● (1700)

As I say, honourable senators, there are many parts of this important report that I could read, but I just wish to refer to one or two other things.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, if I may be allowed to interject, there is a point of order under advisement by Madam Speaker, as to whether the amendment moved by Senator McIlraith is in order or not. If it is decided that it is in order and it is adopted, then the discussion we are having now would be completely useless. In fact, we are putting two points of order before Madam Speaker, which is improper. I would suggest that we adjourn the debate and let Madam Speaker rule on the first point of order. We can then go on with this one, if it becomes necessary to do so.

Senator Argue: I am quite in favour of that, because I think it is a sensible suggestion. I move the adjournment, if I may, or I suggest the adjournment at this time.

Senator Hicks: If Senator Argue moves the adjournment, then on the resumption he will close the debate.

Senator Argue: I am not closing the debate. I have simply suggested the adjournment. After all, it was those opposite who originally suggested it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall reserve my ruling on the point of order until tomorrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I make a brief report on the situation respecting the longshoremen? There really has been very little change since yesterday, when I said that any further report would have to await the outcome of the government's application for an injunction in the Quebec Supreme Court. The court hearing is set for Thursday of this week.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand that it is before Mr. Justice Deschênes of the Superior Court?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 8, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

List of Commissions issued under authority of section 3 of the Public Officers Act during the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 4 of the said Act, Chapter P-30, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of the National Energy Board Report to the Governor in Council, dated March 1975, in the matter of the pricing of natural gas being exported under existing licences, together with a statement thereon by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SALARIES—QUESTION

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. On Tuesday evening Senator Lawson made this statement, as reported at page 860 of Senate Hansard:

—there are more than 1,000 civil servants in this city alone earning in excess of $60,000 a year.

When I heard that statement I thought the number mentioned was incredible and, with all due respect to Senator Lawson, unbelievable. For that reason I was somewhat surprised, to say the least, at the calm and somewhat trusting acceptance of those figures the next day in speeches by Senator Flynn, as reported at page 868 of Hansard and by Senator Manning, at page 876.

The question I wish to ask the Leader of the Government and, of course, he will have to take this as notice; is:

(a) How many public servants in Ottawa are earning in excess of $60,000 a year?

(b) How many federal public servants in the rest of the country are earning in excess of $60,000 a year?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, unfortunately Senator Lawson is not here to clarify what he is reported as having said on Tuesday during the debate. However, it is my understanding that the comment was made inadvertently, that more than 1,000 public servants in this city alone earn in excess of $60,000 per year. I have been informed that, in fact, there are 12 public servants receiving $60,000 a year or more, including heads of federal government agencies. I do not have information at hand to indicate whether or not this includes all crown corporations. If there is further material relating to the matter, I will undertake to provide that for the house.

I do not have the answer at this time to the second portion of the honourable Senator Godfrey's question.

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In view of what appears to be a mounting lobby by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to put pressure on the government and Parliament to remove the Crowsnest Pass rates, would the leader care to outline the policy of the government with regard to these rates? It would be helpful if we could have such a statement from the government leader. He might wish to take the question as notice and elaborate on the policy later.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to take that question as notice, and I will provide the answer as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF COASTAL WATERS FROM RADIO-ACTIVE POLLUTION—QUESTION

Senator Heath: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government, which he may want to take as notice. Could he tell us what provisions exist for the protection of our coastal waters from radio-active pollution due to the operations of foreign nuclear submarines? I am thinking particularly of the waters off the east coast of Vancouver Island—the Strait of Georgia—which in the past we have been careful to keep pollution-free.

Senator Perrault: This is another important question. I shall take it as notice, and I hope to provide a reply within the coming week.

Senator Flynn: This certainly is important to British Columbia.

THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT, THE SALARIES ACT AND THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Perrault moved the third reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Salaries Act and the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

On the Order:

Consideration of the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., to the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the Bill C-34, intitled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act".—(Speaker's Ruling).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday in the course of the debate on the motion for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on Bill C-34, intitled "An act to amend the Farm Credit Act," the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., moved an amendment to the report, whereupon the Honourable Senator Grosart raised a point of order in which he questioned whether or not the motion in amendment is in order.

He based his argument on a quotation that appears at page 126 of the Forms and Proceedings, which are printed as an appendix to the Rules of the Senate, to the effect that the Senate "may not amend a report from a select committee but may refer the report back to the said committee or to the Committee of the Whole."

I have had an opportunity to peruse the Journals of the Senate, which is the official record of this house, and although they reveal that in many cases the practice has been to refer a committee report back to the committee with the view to amending it, I have also found—Senator McIlraith quoted a precedent in that regard—that the Senate has in many other cases amended the committee report. Since both practices have been followed by the Senate over a great number of years, I do not see why either practice should be discontinued. Presumably, if the amendment or amendments to the report were unduly complicated, it might be preferable to refer the matter back to the committee, but that does not appear to be the case here. In any event, the Senate retains the option.

Senator McIlraith's amendment, in my opinion, is perfectly in order, and although Senator Grosart's point of order appears at first glance to have some validity, I rule that under the circumstances it is not well taken. It is therefore in order, if honourable senators now wish to pursue the debate on the amendment, to do so.

Some question has been raised concerning the status and clarification of the Forms and Proceedings which appear as an appendix to the rules, but are not themselves rules of the Senate. I am informed that that matter has already been brought to the attention of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. Therefore, I shall not comment further on that aspect at this time.

● (1410)

Honourable senators, if there are no other speakers on the motion in amendment, the Chair is ready to put the question.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I know we all appreciate very much the ruling given by Her Honour. I want to say briefly that my remarks yesterday should not be taken out of context or extended beyond their intention. Specifically, I do not want to disclaim the Ross Report, as mentioned briefly by Senator Argue. I would remind honourable senators that in my brief intervention I began by saying:

... there is every reason to believe that from a procedural point of view it will simply not be accepted by the other place.

My specific remarks yesterday—and I want to clarify this—should be interpreted in that light only. Since the other place has already rejected an identical amendment, I believe the proposed amendment by the Senate would occasion inevitable conflict between the two houses and, worse, considerable delay in the passage of this important piece of legislation.

Senator Grosart: Which proposed amendment?

Senator Perrault: I propose we move the amendment and adopt the report, as amended.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I understand the desire of everyone to have this bill passed as quickly as possible so that applications for loans can be processed and the farmers involved can receive their loans.

Senator Walker: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: However, I think I should say that in my judgment the amendment proposed by Senator Hays in committee, and put forward in the report of the committee, is a good amendment and one which tends in the right direction, namely, to remove what may well be undue discrimination in providing loans to farmers because of age. I think we are on solid ground in advocating—as the Committee on Agriculture has since initiating the Kent County inquiry—that greater emphasis, substantial emphasis, be placed on providing loans to young farmers, and that there should not be the same requirement for ironclad security. I wish to compliment the government and, specifically, the present Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, for having moved substantially in that direction.

One explanation I have heard for the age limit of 35 years is that if no age limit is contained in the legislation the bureaucrats are liable to give an undue share of the available funds to older farmers. So, to guide the bureaucrats, an age limit had to be contained in the legislation. That may well be a fact, but it is regrettable that we cannot bring about the excellent results intended by this measure without at the same time making it almost certain that some injustices will be done. For instance, a farmer might be in the business only two years when he becomes 35, which in my judgment is still young, and he will no longer be eligible for additional funds under the act. In other words, Parliament will be denying this struggling young farmer certain benefits under the act.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture did invite the Minister of Agriculture to appear before it when it was considering this bill. However, he was unable to attend because of his busy schedule. The chief officials of the Farm Credit Corporation attended, and in ordinary circumstances this representation might have been adequate. However, because we have on the committee a well-informed, aggressive former Minister of Agriculture, Senator Hays, who has very strong views, it is unfortunate that the minister could not have been present. Senator Hays really carried this whole matter, and in very substantial measure this is his report, and I think it tends in the right direction.

For the record, and to demonstrate, as I think it can be, that the direction the committee was taking is a correct one, I should like to read a letter addressed to me, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. It is dated Ottawa, April 24, 1975, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Argue:

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has reviewed Bill C-34 proposing amendments to the Farm Credit Act and wishes to comment briefly on the proposed revisions.

The major thrust of the amendments in Bill C-34 is to provide additional facility in the act for providing credit for young people who are entering farming. The CFA has long supported the position that special credit facilities were required for this purpose, and therefore believes that this provision is a positive step.

The major concern which the federation has regarding the proposed amendments is the provision regarding maxima for loans.

The present act provides for a maximum of $100,000 per farm enterprise. However, in view of the substantial increases in recent years in the price of land, and other farm capital, it is the considered view of our members that the maxima should be increased to $250,000 per farm. In suggesting a maximum at this level we are thinking of providing some scope in the act for possible continuing increases in the cost of capital items coincident with some continuing development toward larger and more capital intensive operations.

We appreciate that the proposed amendments provide for a maximum of $150,000 for loans to young farmers, under the age of 35 years; and a maximum of $100,000 for those not so defined in the act. While the Federation appreciates the general intent of giving an emphasis in the legislation to the credit needs of the younger farmers, we believe that the act should provide for a level of credit in keeping to all farmers whether they are classed as "young farmers" or otherwise. We would not expect that many longer established farmers would need credit in the same amounts as newer, or beginning operators, but nonetheless we believe the opportunity should be there for them should their circumstances suggest larger loans. Consequently in addition to needing to amend section 17.1(1)(a), section 17.1(1)(b) should also be amended.

We note that the proposed amendment provides for the corporation to secure loans by other than only first mortgages. We believe that this is a useful amendment and would support it. This provision will allow for more flexibility in farmers' planning and certainly should simplify the administration, and keep administrative costs to a minimum, where additional loans are being taken by present creditors.

We trust these views will find favour with your committee.

Well, their views did find favour with our committee, so much so that we have a report before us. However, the Senate is in the position of being criticized once again. Sometimes we are criticized because we do too little, and at other times we are criticized because we do too much. It really is very difficult to determine what we should be doing.

I am not particularly impressed with the argument that, because the House of Commons negated a similar amendment, we should capitulate for that reason. Their debate was a very brief one; it was not a protracted debate. The decision to have a voice vote came very quickly, and it would seem to me that the other place might well consider an amendment from this house, even if they did take a different decision a few weeks ago. However, I understand the urgency of passing this bill.

Honourable senators, all this makes my position rather difficult. The report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has much in its favour. I understand and sympathize with the position of those who wish to support it, and I understand the reasons they have for doing so.

In view of the fact that, in my opinion, it is a good report, and because it has been presented to this house by the committee, I do support it, and I will vote against Senator McIlraith's motion in amendment.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, although I am not a member of the Agriculture Committee, I was asked the other day to second the motion in question. I did so in good faith. What I am about to say I also say in good faith.

We have now heard the facts with respect to what took place before the Agriculture Committee. We know that there is a certain difference of opinion with respect to this measure among those on the government side. I think such a difference merely shows the wisdom of the Senate in not feeling it has to follow slavishly any given course.

I think there are several points we should bear in mind, Senator Hays, who is very knowledgeable in agriculture, sponsored the amendment in committee and is certainly in favour of the adoption of the report of the committee. Obviously, the most able chairman, Senator Argue, wants the report adopted. The government leader has brought in an expert, Senator McIlraith, to solve the problem, but I would suggest that a salutary solution would be simply to have no vote now and at a later date, when in the wisdom of the government it is appropriate, the government should bring in an amendment which would be satisfactory to everyone, including the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, first of all, if I may, I should like to revert to the statement by Her Honour on the point of order I raised earlier. I merely wish to say that I agree completely with Her Honour's ruling. I welcome it and trust that it will facilitate the work of the Rules Committee in definitely deciding the validity of certain parts of our so-called rules which are to be found between the covers of the red book.

With respect to Senator McIlraith's amendment, I have no strong views as to how I might wish to vote, if it becomes a matter of division. On the other hand, I disagree with some of the reasons given for the Senate's rejecting this part of the report of the Agriculture Committee.

References have been made today to the suggestion that we should not adopt the amendment proposed by the committee because a similar amendment was defeated recently in the House of Commons. I cannot really think of a worse reason for not carrying through and supporting the committee's amendment. Obviously, any bill coming to us from the Commons expresses the recent wisdom of the Commons respecting the totality of that particular bill. The fact that in this particular case one item has been brought to our attention bears no relation to the fact that the whole bill was dealt with in the Commons item by item. That is the case with all bills there. Moreover, there are usually many objections raised. Those objections are discussed, and the Commons then makes its decision on the clauses of the bill. Whether or not an amendment is proposed makes their decision on the clauses no less their decision at that particular moment.

The second reason why I disagree with this philosophy is that the purpose of the Senate is to take a second look at everything the Commons does in connection with a bill. Whether it was yesterday or one month ago makes no difference to me.

In this particular case we appear to have new evidence that was not before the Commons. We have the evidence and support of Senator Hays, a former Minister of Agriculture, which has been referred to, and my own guess—and it is only a guess—would be that if we made the amendment, and if the bill went back to the Commons they might accept it, in view of the evidence and argument that have come forward subsequent to the time when the Commons rejected that amendment.

As a matter of precedent I think it would be most unwise for us to assume that we will not amend, or that we will not suggest the reversal of, a decision of the Commons made on any amendment or other motion in respect to the bill.

My second objection to the arguments in favour of the amendment is the continued use of the word "confrontation." I think it is a great mistake for us to assume that every time we disagree with the Commons we are creating a confrontation between the two houses. That is not the concept of the role of this house as I read it in the British North America Act or anywhere else. Our role here is sometimes described as one of "sober second thought". It is in fact to examine the wisdom of the decisions of the Commons, and to make our report in the form of our handling of the bill here on three readings. I therefore suggest that we should not think of this in terms of a confrontation.

Every serious examination that I have seen of the Senate and its efficiency, and its work in Canadian affairs generally, has started with an examination of how many amendments we have made to Commons bills. I would suggest that one of the major measures of our efficiency is the number of amendments we make, and therefore it is a mistake, in my view, to think of them as necessarily being confrontations. That is not the relationship between the two houses that is normal. There is a situation in which there can be confrontation, and there are special provisions in our rules, and in the rules of the House of Commons, to deal with the kinds of differences of opinion between the two houses which could properly be called confrontations. I suggest that this does not apply to the normal process of our amending bills that have been passed by the Commons.

That is all I have to say on the matter, except for a brief comment on the suggestion of urgency. I agree that there seem to be reasons why the passage of this bill is urgent. However, the obvious answer to that would appear to be that the urgency must be one felt very keenly by the government, but if the government is concerned about the urgency of the bill, the time for them to have brought the matter before this house was long before the day or week in which they find it urgent. Surely the urgency has existed for a long time, and it is the business of the government to manage its affairs in the other place and here in such a way that we do not have these continual pleas of urgency as reasons for quick passage of bills.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on Bill C-34, intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act," be now adopted.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C.;

That the report be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out the first three paragraphs thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred Bill C-34 intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act," has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, April 22, 1975, examined the said bill and now reports the same, without amendment, but with the following recommendations:"

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment? Will those in favour of the motion please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against the motion please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it. I declare the motion in amendment carried.

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion in amendment agreed to, on division.

REPORT ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the main motion, as amended?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the main motion, as amended, carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division, and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, in view of the attitude, as I assess it, that there is urgency with regard to the passage of this bill, I move, with leave, that the bill be read a third time now.

● (1430)

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hays, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-32, intituled: "An Act to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade".—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak now on the motion that is adjourned in my name. But since I know there is some urgency about this bill, not quite the same kind of urgency as attached to the bill we have just passed, if there is any other senator who wishes to speak at this time, I should be glad to yield. It is my intention to speak to this order Tuesday next, but I would be very glad to yield to any senator who wishes to speak now.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I too would like to say a few words on this bill, but I should like to defer doing so until our next sitting, if that will not delay the bill too long.

Order Stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE
(TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 30, the debate on the motion of Senator Argue for second reading of Bill S-23, to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment).

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate on this bill last week I was standing in for the Government Whip who happened to be absent on that occasion. It was not my intention to participate in the debate because I have already spoken several times in this chamber in favour of total abolition of capital punishment. My views are well known, and I see no reason to repeat them over and over again. I adjourned the debate in case some other senator might wish to participate, and also to reserve the sponsor's right to reply.

Having said that, honourable senators, I am now prepared to yield to any other member of this house who wishes to speak at this time.

Hon. J. J. Greene: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, does Senator Greene have leave to proceed at this time instead of Senator Carter?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Greene: As is the case with Senator Carter, it had not been my anticipation to participate in this debate, and for the same reason. My views are well known and have been widely publicized; at least, my voting record in the other place has made my views very clear. I was moved to reconsider my decision not to reiterate my views, first, by the excellence of the speeches of the mover and seconder and of Senator Macdonald who also spoke on this bill. I was also moved, to some extent, by the contrary views expressed by Senator Beaubien, but I shall say little of him because I think he has been dealt with more effectively than I could ever deal with him by his own party colleague, Senator O'Leary.

I shall merely say that I should like to enlighten, if I can, Senator Beaubien on his history. It seems that he analogizes the need for more hangman's nooses with the steps that Rome took to protect herself by erecting walls in the days of her decline. As I understand the analogy, he says that if we build more hangman's traps, just as Rome built more walls, then we will save our society just as Rome saved hers. I fear his sociology is not much better than his history, because as I recall history the walls did not save Rome. Rome paid tribute to Attila the Hun in or about the year 450 A.D., and Attila was not stopped by the walls. He was stopped by disease in his own army, by his inability to maintain his lines of communication, and ultimately by the personal intervention of Pope Leo I. As I have said, I suggest that Senator Beaubien's sociology is no better than his history. We should not pay too much heed to his plea that we build more scaffolds to bring law and order to this country.

I am also moved, honourable senators, by the fact that irrespective of having had my say in the other place on this issue, it is only fitting that one who has been in that position should also make his record clear in this house. I feel very strongly that the validity of this chamber, if it needs any reaffirmation, will be determined not so much, as we were told yesterday, by the number of days on which we occupy our seats here; it will be determined or made valid by the fertility of our ideas, by their relevance at any particular time in Canadian evolution, and by the quality of our debate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Greene: For this reason I think it is important that any of us who have views on any matter raised in the Senate should make them known and have them recorded. It may well be that if our ideas are of sufficient fertility, and if, indeed, our debate is of sufficient quality, then the happy day may come when even the Fourth Estate will attend here, as it did in the Mother of Parliaments in the day when Burke coined that phrase, so that the people of Canada will come to know better than they apparently do today that the appointive half of the legislative duality has a very real contribution to make to our constitutional system.

● (1440)

Secondly, honourable senators, I was moved to speak in this debate by the fact that I am probably one of the few in our country who has had the dual responsibility of, at one time, defending an accused person charged with a capital crime in the courts of our land and, at a later date, exercising the executive prerogative of mercy in the Privy Council chamber. I can only say that I found both these inexorable duties not only difficult of performance, but virtually impossible of performance. Certainly, in defending a man charged with a capital crime very early in my career at the Bar, I felt the inadequacy of my forensic and persuasive talents in having the life of a fellow human being resting in my hands. While that may have been a human failing, I am reinforced in this conviction by the views of men who have established a far greater reputation, quite justly so, than I could ever have aspired to at the Bar, the criminal Bar in particular—men such as Arthur Maloney, Q.C., who spoke so eloquently on this issue in the other place in the days of a prior administration; men such as the now Mr. Justice Lawrence Pennell; men such as Mr. Justice G. Arthur Martin, who, during his time, was the finest practitioner not only at the criminal Bar in Canada but possibly in the English-speaking world. Men of this ability and capacity to do that job in the court room, which cannot be questioned, these giants of the criminal Bar, almost universally subscribe to the fact that the state has no right to take human life. So it would seem that that half of the impossible conundrum, the defence of one accused whose life is in jeopardy, cannot be adequately fulfilled.

At the other side of the conundrum is the royal prerogative of mercy, exercised by virtue of constitutional evolution by the Cabinet. It is one of the elements of the criminal procedure, for which no higher authority exists, in my humble judgment, than Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. He tells us that this function is an important element within the law. It is a misapprehension on the part of many viewers of the subject that the royal prerogative of mercy exists outside the law. This function is equally impossible to fulfill by means of any judicial or precedent method.

We have no less authority than Shakespeare, when he puts into the mouth of Portia, in that greatest of all speeches on the quality of mercy, apposite reference to the royal prerogative:

But mercy is above this sceptred sway,

It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,

It is an attribute to God himself.

I think it unlikely that in this or any other land we will have a Privy Council at any time composed of men who have that divine attribute. Certainly in my opinion anyone who has had this awesome responsibility in the Cabinet knows that today there is a hue and cry for precedent, and it should only be exercised if certain conditions have been met at trial, et cetera. Well, the quality of mercy cannot be measured in this way and it is, therefore, an impossible conundrum again.

So, on the two halves of my personal dilemma I have found that two aspects of this issue are part of the law, which is impossible for mere human beings to enforce adequately. If there is any law that cannot be enforced adequately by ordinary human beings, then surely it is a bad law. What we as legislators are here to do is remove from the statute books laws which are bad, and replace them with ones which are beneficial.

These are my reasons, honourable senators, for speaking on this matter. I have not a great deal to add. As I say, everything that has been said statistically has been said before and I have no new or brilliant idea to bring to the debate.

I was much moved by Senator O'Leary's eloquent plea in respect of the doctrine of atonement. I, as a mere Anglican, cannot speak to the spiritual aspect of the doctrine, but I would draw to the attention of the Senate some secular thought in that regard. Longfellow, I believe, puts it this way in his poem Ladder of St. Augustine:

Nor deem the irrevocable Past,

As wholly wasted, wholly vain,

If, rising on its wrecks, at last

To something nobler we attain.

Now, while we keep many statistics, I have not found it easy to find human records to illustrate to the Senate events which occurred in which rehabilitation took place. However, I have one case to which I would draw the attention of honourable senators, that of Richard Loeb and Nathan Leopold, which took place in Chicago in 1924. This was as a result of probably the most gruesome and horrendous murders in the annals of criminal law. Two young men of genius capacity became enmeshed in Nietzsche's philosophy and thought of themselves, by reason of their tremendous intellect, as supermen.

They gruesomely took the life of a 14-year old boy, Bobby Franks, in the firm belief that they, being supermen, should be permitted to do as they pleased. This horrible crime certainly raised a tremendous popular outcry and there would be little doubt, as these were very rich young men, that the mob, had they had their way, would have lynched them very quickly and taken their lives out of hand. They were saved from the gallows by the genius of one of the great men of our century, Clarence Darrow, who was able to persuade the court on two scores. First, he persuaded the judge that the law of insanity as defined in the criminal law in the state of Illinois—which is similar, I believe, throughout the English-speaking world—did not conform with insanity as defined by the advance of medicine at that stage. Secondly, he persuaded the court that the state of Illinois had never before taken the life of boys of that age. It was really on that latter score that instead of being sent to the gallows, or the gas chamber—or whichever was the beneficent method of the day which the state took in doing away with life—those boys were given 99 years plus life in the penitentiary.

Loeb was killed by a fellow inmate at Joliet Penitentiary shortly after his incarceration. The case I want particularly to draw to the attention of honourable senators is that of Nathan Leopold.

During the course of his term in the penitentiary, he used his genius capacity to good measure, both in doing rehabilitative work with prisoners and by becoming the librarian and setting up a very effective library whereby an education system in the penitentiary became feasible. While in jail, he learned 12 languages, and on his release did humanitarian work, which certainly makes us pause and think whether taking this life, or any other, would have had any useful aspect.

During World War II, he offered himself as a human guinea pig in Malaria research. After he was released in 1958, after some 34 years in prison, he moved to Puerto Rico, became director of the only leprosy hospital on the island, and his work in educational and sociological fields made many people—certainly in Puerto Rico—say at that time, "Thank goodness they did not extinguish that life. Look at how much good he has done since."

To those who believe in the retributive aspect of criminal law, may I quote briefly from Leopold's autobiography on what he thought about his penalty. He addresses himself to the question of whether he had been punished enough:

I have spent 33 years in jail. I have lost those near and dear to me while I was there including my father, my aunt who was a second mother to me and my brother. I have forfeited any chance of amounting to anything. I have forfeited every chance for happiness. I have forfeited a chance for a family. Whether this is sufficient I do not know.

I suggest to those who believe in the punitive aspect of the law—the eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth, philosophy—that surely those words would indicate that the punishment was sufficient.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, we should seriously consider this one example. Who can tell at an early age what the life that we snuff out might become, if we snuff out the life of one person who has the potential to do the good that Nathan Leopold did in later life? More serious still, how can we tell what budding El Greco, Velázquez, or incipient Beethoven, there might be at 17, 18, 19, 20, 21 or 22 years of age, if that life is snuffed out and we prevent any possibility—not merely of atonement—of service to society? That, surely, is a terrible responsibility for the state to take, to prevent the possibility of secular atonement by the snuffing out of a life. That is something which we should seriously consider.

Honourable senators, it may appear anomalous that this bill, on this serious issue, is the subject matter before this half of the legislative duality of Parliament. I would suggest that this might very properly be the right half of the legislative team to decide matters such as this. Today, with the rapidity of communications and with our constitutional evolution having taken the direction it has, we have practically abandoned the representative theory of Parliament, and in the popular house—again by reason of the rapidity of communications, by reason of tradition—they have almost come to accept the republican view of representation, namely, the delegate view; that a member of the other place is merely a delegate—or is, in fact, a delegate—for those he represents and for the country at large.

The best example of that view, that in the other place there is no real attempt to maintain the representative theory as opposed to the delegate theory, might be the following. Honourable senators will recall that early in 1968 a money bill was defeated in the other place, and there was a constitutional question as a result. The question was not resolved in Parliament. It was resolved by the flow of communication engendered between the public and the elected representatives, urging that this defeat of the government on a money bill not cause an election. It was through this "delegate" approach that the public made it known it did not want an election, and therefore there was not one.

This precedent makes it perhaps impossible for a popularly elected chamber ever to decide longstanding issues on which the public feels strongly, except in accord with what might be the will of the mob—be it a lynch mob or not—at any given time. It may well be that the Senate, because it is not faced with that sort of pressure, and because we are clearly delegates of no one, by reason of the security of tenure alone, can arrive at solutions to some of the thorny issues that simply do not lend themselves to solution under the "delegate theory" of an elective legislature. It may well be that the constitutional evolution of the bicameral legislative system can lend itself to that conclusion.

Successive governments for the past two decades have not been able to arrive at a solution to this problem. I suggest, honourable senators, that if there is a necessity of establishing the validity and need of a second legislative chamber in our constitutional process, it clearly comes at a time when we have a problem before us that clearly has not been soluble by either government or the popular assembly. The solution to this type of thorny problem by the appointive chamber will put us on the surest and firmest foundation, namely, that within our constitutional totality there are times when only an appointive chamber can solve problems which simply do not lend themselves to solution by the elective chamber.

Honourable senators, in addressing the court, Clarence Darrow, to whom I referred earlier, had this to say in connection with capital punishment.

—if the state in which I live is not kinder, more humane, more considerate, more intelligent, than the mad act of these two boys, I am sorry I have lived so long.

Honourable senators, I suggest that we in this house have a solution to the problem of capital punishment, as contained in Bill S-23, that is more humane, more considerate, more intelligent, than the law as it presently exists, and if we can arrive at a solution to this problem, we will indeed have fulfilled the responsibility of this chamber under our Constitution.

May I respectfully urge your consideration and support for Bill S-23.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S YEAR

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, April 29, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Quart calling the attention of the Senate to International Women's Year.

Hon. Muriel McQueen Fergusson: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Quart for having called the attention of the Senate to International Women's Year in her very interesting speech on March 19 last. After listening to her speech and rereading it several times, however, I am uncertain as to whether or not she gives it her support. My object in following both Senator Quart and Senator Norrie in this debate is not to enlighten honourable senators about International Women's Year, of which, I presume, honourable senators have heard and read a great deal, but to make it very clear that I support wholeheartedly International Women's Year and its objectives.

When the United Nations recognizes and wishes to draw attention to a serious problem, it declares or designates a year in which it will bring that matter to the attention of the world. The year 1974 was designated World Population Year, when the threat of over-population was stressed; 1970 was designated International Education Year; 1968 was declared International Year for Human Rights. There have been several other years designated by the United Nations, some of which have been successful in causing the peoples of the world to bestir themselves to overcome the problem which was the cause of the year's being designated by the United Nations. Some of the years so designated, however, have been abysmal failures.

Both Senator Quart and Senator Norrie referred to Mrs. Helvi Sipilä of Finland, who is responsible for International Women's Year. She is Assistant Secretary General for Humanitarian and Social Affairs at the United Nations, which is the highest position held to date by a woman in the United Nations Secretariat. Mrs. Sipilä is a distinguished lawyer who has been a member of a number of governmental committees in her own country, the purposes of which were to deal with such things as marital law, the protection and rights of children, civic education and international development. She has also served on the Supreme Court of her own country and has, for a number of years, represented Finland at the United Nations as a member of its delegation.

For some years she was also a vice-president of the International Council of Women, and she has been deeply involved in the World Scout Federation. When she was International Chairman of Zonta, a worldwide service organization, she visited Canada and made many friends, all of whom have been happy to welcome her back several times, in connection with her work for International Women's Year and also in connection with her responsibilities concerning the United Nations Congress on Crime, which will take place in Toronto in 1976.

The United Nations has many things to its credit, but it also has things to its discredit, for sometimes it has not lived up to the high ideals of its founders. It has, on occasion, ignored and violated its own Charter, and as a result has lost much of the prestige it had in its earlier years. Consequently, it is not only due to 1975 having been designated by the United Nations as International Women's Year that it is receiving worldwide support; it is because the people of the world recognize that it is timely and that it is a good idea. Good ideas, once planted in the human mind, are apt to grow. Victor Hugo said:

● (1510)

Greater even than the tread of mighty armies is an idea whose time has come.

And the time has come to recognize the equality of the sexes.

More than 80 heads of state and governments signed a declaration of support for International Women's Year. Many countries inaugurated it with special ceremonies and seminars. The peoples of the world recognize that International Women's Year involves the basic rights of human beings, the rights so vividly set out in Thomas Paine's Rights of Man; the same human rights that were the moving forces behind the American Revolution and the French Revolution.

International Women's Year has been described as a social revolution by women. Well, in all revolutions the leaders have been those whose rights have been violated or ignored, but men who truly believe in human rights are equally involved and are giving wholehearted support. People throughout the world, men and women, realize that this is an idea "whose time has come," and this is the reason for the success International Women's Year is having in so many countries.

The principle of the equal rights of men and women was one of the high ideals stated in the Charter of the United Nations in 1945. The principle was reaffirmed in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, which was adopted by the General Assembly in 1948. However, a report which I found in a United Nations publication, issued in connection with International Women's Year, says:

Equality between men and women does not exist in the world today. It is still a great disadvantage to be born female. There are countries where women may not spend the money they earn, or own property, where they may not apply for a passport or go to court without permission of their husbands.

The report goes on to say:

It would appear in male-dominated societies women's work is apt, without reason, to be regarded as of less value than that of a man.

From statistics we have received, it seems that this can with truth be said of our country. There are also still some countries where women are even denied the right to vote.

On a worldwide scale there is much to be done to bring about equality between the sexes. Recognizing this, 1975 was designated by the United Nations as International Women's Year, with a three-pronged objective—first, to promote equality between men and women; secondly, to integrate women into the social and economic development effort of nations, pointing out the important part they can play if given the opportunity; and thirdly, to give recognition to the importance of women's increasing contribution towards the development of friendly relations and cooperation towards strengthening world peace.

With reference to the third aim, I am reminded that Eleanor Roosevelt, with her wide experience, said she had found that women are always willing to cooperate, but she found that men were always anxious to dominate. More cooperation is certainly needed today, and perhaps this characteristic of women, if they are given the opportunity to exercise it on a wide scale, may lead to greater peace in our troubled world.

Sylva Gelber, the knowledgeable Director of the Women's Bureau in our own Department of Labour, is quoted as having said that the concept of International Women's Year is valid internationally. It is certainly recognized that there is a direct relationship between the status of women and the economic prosperity of a country. This has been recognized in a number of countries. Honourable senators will remember that, when I was speaking about Mexico in this chamber on April 10 last, I pointed out it had been recognized by Mexico. I then said that Mexico, recognizing the contribution that women can make toward the development of the country, if given the opportunity to participate as equals with men, is in the process of passing laws guaranteeing that equality, not just to grant rights to women but to help toward the prosperity of their country.

In 1966 Canadian women, aware of existing discrimination against women in this country, and led by Laura Sabia, who was then President of the Canadian Federation of University Women, pressed the government for the appointment of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada. As you know and have been told, the commission was appointed in 1967. That commission, under Florence Bird, who was a well-known writer and commentator on radio and television, provided a public forum where people could express their opinions on matters that had to do with the equality of women. It proved actually to be a thorough psychological study of the status of women in this country, and it revealed to the people of Canada many injustices which, due to deep-rooted customs, traditions and practices, had been ignored.

The report of the commission, which pinpointed inequalities in our culture and recommended solutions, greatly changed Canadian attitudes toward women. The solutions were embodied in 167 recommendations, but only 122 of these came within the jurisdiction of the federal government. To date, 44 of the recommendations under federal jurisdiction have been implemented entirely; 37 have been partially implemented. If legislation already introduced in the House of Commons is passed by both houses, that will provide for the implementation of another 12 of those recommendations.

Although this shows concern by the government and a desire to eliminate existing discrimination, there is great impatience amongst women because the pending legislation has been so long delayed. They consider it deserves higher priority than it has received. Also, as I said in this chamber on October 24, 1974, when speaking in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, the anti-discrimination legislation pending "seems to give only a perfunctory bow to women's demands in that it focuses attention on matters which are peripheral to the causes espoused by women's rights groups."

There is more than impatience; there is frustration felt because the human rights legislation promised for so long has not yet been introduced in Parliament. There is a strong feeling that, although we are well advanced into the second quarter of International Women's Year, anti-discrimination legislation has received little attention during this year.

On the other hand, Canada, which through the work of the royal commission had already recognized the necessity of taking steps to assure equality to women, has welcomed the impetus given to such a movement by the designation of 1975 as International Women's Year, and has been generous in making funds available for promoting in our country the aims of International Women's Year. We have an International Women's Year Secretariat, under the direction of Mary Gusella, and a Status of Women Division of the Privy Council Office, headed by Martha Hynna.

They have undertaken a national educational and promotional campaign, through the media, aimed at changing the traditional attitudes that underlie the existing discrimination against women. That developed, as you know, into the widely known "Why Not" campaign. I must say that originally I did not favour it. However, the opposition it engendered has aroused more interest than its positive appeal. For that reason, I have reluctantly come to believe that it has been successful in bringing International Women's Year and its aims to the attention of the Canadian public. Perhaps it was not the way they planned it, but it has certainly been successful in accomplishing what they had in mind.

There is also a Women's Program in the Department of the Secretary of State. Suzanne Findlay is the director of that program, which ordinarily has a budget of about $200,000. This year the Women's Program was given half of the amount allotted for International Women's Year. That gave the Women's Program the opportunity to do many things it could not do otherwise. Suzanne Findlay says that the Women's Program "wants to support the initiative of women's groups and also to sensitize the general public to the particular problem which women have." With the added support given to them in International Women's Year, they have been very successful this year, and many women's groups throughout the country are very active and are becoming aware of their potentialities.

They are also becoming aware that there is a serious gap between the roles which women could play, and the means at their disposal to enable them to play those roles. I should like to point out that it is important that they keep working for these aims in 1976, 1977 and 1978—indeed, until the aims are achieved. To that end it will be absolutely necessary for those groups to continue to receive encouragement in the years to come as well as in 1975. It is not only in 1975 that we should pursue equality for women in our own country.

Recent Supreme Court decisions have made it clear that, if Canada is to give credence to the aims of equal rights, the laws relating to the division of matrimonial property on divorce or on separation without divorce must be changed. Family laws must recognize that marriage is an economic as well as a social partnership of equals. To give equal rights to Indian women, for example, the law, which causes them to lose their Indian status on marrying a non-Indian while at the same time Indian men who marry non-Indians do not lose their status, must be changed.

I have an especial interest in women in the work force, in their opportunities for advancement in their work and their right to equal pay with men. In school and college women compete well with men, very often leading the classes. A recent article in a weekend magazine about Judge Thomas Berger, the British Columbia Supreme Court Judge who is presiding over the inquiry regarding the impact the proposed Mackenzie Valley natural gas pipe line would have on the Canadian North, mentioned he was a good student. When interviewed, he referred to his career at the University of British Columbia, where he studied law, and said that on graduating he was third in his class of 60. In the article he is quoted as saying, "No males were ahead of me, but two females were."

If women can do so well in university, why is it that, for example, a 24-year-old man leaving university with a degree, on an average receives more money in his first job than a woman of the same age with equivalent education? Statistics show that that is true. Why is it that a male high school graduate earns an average of 34.2 per cent more than the equivalent female graduate?

Madeleine Parent, Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Workers Union, has spent 35 years as a trade union organizer. Speaking in a lecture series recently, she said that Canadian women are paid $7 billion less annually than men in identical jobs. They are paid $3.5 billion less in Ontario alone. She also said that our equal pay legislation has been of little benefit to women, owing to the fact that the government investigators sided openly with employers during the investigation of complaints.

[Senator Fergusson.]

There is a general impression that increasing numbers of women are entering professions in Canada. But is that impression correct? In 1901 about 15 per cent of the total female work force was in the professional category. In 1971 more women were in the work force and women were in more diversified professional careers, but in that year, 1971, only 16 per cent of the women in the work force were in the professional category. At that rate of increase, honourable senators, it would take about five centuries to bring about the equality of women in Canada.

The labour force statistics do not show that the status of women in Canada is making much progress. As Senator Norrie said in this debate, in 1962 a man working full time for a year would be earning 47.4 per cent more than the average woman working full time. In 1971 a man was earning 44 per cent more than the average woman. That difference has decreased slightly in the nine years, but not by very much.

Figures from Statistics Canada show that pay discrepancies exist between males and females in practically every occupational area, and always to the disadvantage of the female. A report of the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labour shows that average wages and salaries for similar jobs in manufacturing, service, technical and office categories are consistently lower for women than for men. The report goes on to say further that, "although women represent one-third of the labour force they do not occupy a place in the labour force remotely proportionate to their numbers, either in terms of occupational distribution or in terms of compensation."

The studies of the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty revealed that there are large numbers of women in the labour force who are heads of families, and who are the only support of their families. It costs those women as much to support their families as it does men who are heads of families. Nevertheless, because of traditional prejudices, those women are not given as good opportunities for promotion and advancement and, consequently, for higher salaries as those given to men. Nor, according to reports of Statistics Canada and the Women's Bureau, are they even given equal pay for doing the same work as men. The struggle for equal rights for women—and equal pay opportunities are certainly part of that struggle—is not an anti-male struggle, but is merely a struggle to provide equality for 51 per cent of the human beings who make up our population.

Honourable senators, although it might have been expected that there would be general agreement among women with respect to the whole question of abortion, in fact it is a subject on which there is wide disagreement among women in this country—even to the point that there is strong division and bitter feeling among them on this particular aspect of women's rights. For my own part, I have twice stated in this chamber that I think the offences related to abortion should be deleted from the Criminal Code. Certainly, the subject of abortion is closely involved with that of women's rights, but I do not think that it is the only question, or that it is even the greatest or most important question regarding women's rights.

History tells us that Canadian women won the vote by persuasion rather than by the violence that was used in other countries before the vote was granted. However, had that violence not taken place, it is doubtful if persuasion alone would have been effective. Canadian women are hopeful that, again by persuasion, they can secure the rights which are the objectives of International Women's Year.

Determined as they are, they are not asking for laws to enforce equal rights in as drastic a manner as those in effect in Mogadiscio in Somalia. After equal pay laws were passed in that country at the beginning of this year, it is reported that ten who spoke against those laws were executed by a firing squad, six were given 30 years in prison, and 17 were sent to prison for 20 years. A member of the women's liberation group in that country is reported to have said, with a slight smile, "Since January, it's funny, but no one complains much about women having equality."

Our traditional attitudes with regard to women's place in society are the result of customs and traditions that have been instilled, and at the present time are being instilled, into young Canadians in their homes and in their schools.

In the Philippines there are a number of upper class women prominent in professions and in government. Leticia Shohani is an ambassador from that country, and when speaking of such women, of whom she is one, says, "We are not typical."

Why is it that in our own country if a woman is successful she is considered an unusual woman? She is not considered typical of what women can do, but, as Kenneth Haig said in her book about Cora Hind, if a woman fails she fails for all womankind. Why is she only considered typical of women when she fails, but untypical if she is successful?

Before women can achieve the equality they seek and can make the contribution of which they are capable, these attitudes must be changed either by education or by legislation. It is a fact that today's laws change yesterday's attitudes, and women in Canada are hopeful that during International Women's Year laws will be passed in this country that will bring the attitudes of all Canadians into line with the principles of human rights which are so plainly stated in the United Nations Charter to which we adhere.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Inman, debate adjourned.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am pleased to report to the Senate on the labour situation at St. Lawrence ports and the application of an act of Parliament directing striking longshoremen to return to work.

Yesterday at Montreal, striking longshoremen met with their leadership, who informed union members that fines and/or imprisonment would face members who did not obey the judgment of the Quebec Superior Court ordering them to return to work.

I am sure all senators are pleased to note that longshoring operations recommenced at Montreal on a reduced scale but they are resumed. They resumed yesterday afternoon. Longshoring activities at the St. Laurence ports of Trois-Rivières, Quebec City and Montreal returned to full-scale operation today.

Honourable senators, I am sure, are aware that the judgment of Mr. Justice Deschênes was a strong judgment in that it left no doubt that the law passed by Parliament approximately three weeks ago was valid law and applicable to the St. Lawrence ports situation.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, am I right in concluding from the government leader's report that no action will be taken against the stevedores if they obey the injunction of Chief Justice Deschênes, even though they do so a couple of days late? It seems to me I heard that the Minister of Justice was considering placing charges against the stevedores for not returning to work when we passed legislation, some twenty days ago, ordering them back to work immediately. Is that correct?

Senator Perrault: I am not able to give a definitive answer to that question at this time. Consideration has been given to a number of alternatives. I shall endeavour to obtain further information before the Senate rises tonight.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN TEXTILE PROBLEMS—STATEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my intention to speak in the near future and review in some detail the steps taken by the Canadian government to encourage the continued development of an efficient domestic textile industry. However, I might at this time simply bring attention to the measures announced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Alastair Gillespie, regarding textile imports and their part in the national textile policy.

The minister recently announced that restraints will be arranged on imports of men's fine suits from Korea in line with the recommendations of the Textile and Clothing Board set out in the board's interim report on fine suits which was tabled in the House of Commons; that imports of fine suits from Taiwan, Hong Kong, Hungary, Romania and Poland are to be monitored through use of the import control list; that imports from all sources of worsted spun acrylic yarn for machine knitting, and double-knit and warp-knit fabrics, are to be monitored through use of the import control list to ensure that imports do not exceed the levels stipulated in Textile and Clothing Board recommendations for these products; that imports of nylon filament fabrics from Taiwan are being placed on the import control list to facilitate administration of Taiwan's recent voluntary undertaking to restrain exports of nylon fabrics to Canada to avoid disrupting the market.

The minister went on to say that action is underway with the Republic of Korea for the purpose of arranging a restraint on exports of men's fine suits to Canada, pending completion of the current inquiry of the Textile and Clothing Board on men's suits, jackets and pants. In its interim report on men's suits from the Republic of Korea, the board expressed the opinion that until such time as it can complete its current inquiry, steps must be taken to discourage the placing of further large orders for men's fine suits in the Republic of Korea if damage which would be difficult to repair is to be avoided.

Full use will be made of the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act to encourage stability on the textile market. By placing on the import control list products which are vulnerable to competition from low-priced imports, advance information can be obtained on rates of importation that will indicate what further special protective measures may be required.

It is the view of the government that the measures announced are in keeping with the national textile policy which the government has been implementing since 1970. The policy is to encourage the development of an efficient domestic industry which is internationally competitive on a normal basis. Where this objective is jeopardized by injurious imports, special measures of protection are introduced.

I felt I should make that statement at this time in view of the concern of all honourable senators about the textile industry in this country.

Senator Cameron: Could the Leader of the Government give us some idea of the dollar value of the suits or suiting materials brought in from Taiwan and/or Hong Kong in a year?

Senator Perrault: I will be glad to take that question as notice because of its technical nature.

Senator Asselin: Is the statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce an indication that the Senate is being refused the opportunity to have one of its committees study this question, even though it was raised in the Senate by Senator Desruisseaux and other senators?

Senator Perrault: There is no intention to restrict the right of any Senate committee to investigate matters of considerable importance in this country. However, I did wish to indicate to the house the concern of the government about the entire question, to indicate that the government is acutely aware of the importance of the subject and has taken action.

Senator Asselin: In view of the statement made by the minister, is this the reason why the debate on the textile industry was cut in the Senate?

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators that there is no intention at all to restrict debate in the Senate on this subject matter. I intend to make a statement on behalf of the government as soon as possible.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to inquire of the Leader of the Government if these measures were taken to correct a situation which has prevailed for approximately two years now, and which labour leaders and some manufacturers exposed by way of protest to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce? I refer, of course, to the difficulties in the textile industry caused by the importations that the government leader mentioned.

Senator Perrault: Representations have been received from a number of areas in Canada, and from a number of sectors, including both business and labour. It may be necessary to take additional measures to assure the continuing viability of the Canadian textile industry. It is my further understanding that a study on this subject is underway in the other place. There is substantial concern about the problem, but I again want to assure honourable senators that there is no intention to restrict consideration of this problem here.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONNAUGHT LABORATORIES LTD.—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on Tuesday, March 25, Senator Sullivan asked the following question:

Will the Government of Canada, as sole owner of Connaught Laboratories Limited, request the Ministry of Health of Ontario to monitor all proposals for residential development in close proximity to the Connaught Laboratories with the object of preventing any possible hazard to the residents of such developments or hindrance to the work of the laboratories?

Senator Sullivan's original question on this subject was asked on Tuesday, March 4, and I replied to the question on Tuesday, March 11. However, on Tuesday, March 25, Senator Sullivan expressed concern that the question had not, in his view, been answered adequately.

● (2010)

After discussion with my colleague, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, I am pleased to assure the house that the government shares Senator Sullivan's concern, both about the safety of Ontario residents in proximity to Connaught Laboratories and the possible hindrance to the work of the laboratories which might be caused by residential developments nearby. As has been stated before, the procedures employed by Connaught Laboratories Limited are such that there is no cause for concern by local residents. All efforts are being made by Connaught Laboratories to assure that their work is not hindered by residential developments nearby. For these reasons, the Government of Canada does not propose to enter into negotiations with the Ministry of Health of Ontario concerning monitoring residential development in that area at the present time.

Honourable senators, I have a reply to Senator Forsey's question of Thursday, April 24, but because the senator is not in the chamber this evening I shall provide the answer at a later time.

THE HONOURABLE EDGAR E. FOURNIER

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I confess that inadvertently I failed to welcome back to the chamber one of our distinguished senators serving with our loyal Opposition, the Honourable Edgar Fournier. We are delighted to see him back again and hope he has fully recovered his health. It is good to see him looking so well.

Senator Flynn: We are very happy to see him back because we need him badly.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators, I can assure you it is a pleasure to be back.

[Senator Perrault.]

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hays, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-32, intituled: "An Act to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade". (Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I ask that you allow this debate, which stands adjourned in my name, to be continued now by Senator Manning, who has expressed a wish to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, first of all, I thank Senator Grosart and the house for the opportunity of proceeding with the debate on this bill tonight.

Bill C-32 was explained in considerable detail by Senator Hays, and certainly it ranks among the more important pieces of legislation to be introduced into this present Parliament. It confers on the Government of Canada some very far-reaching powers. It establishes in law the practice of what might properly be described as political price fixing for two of Canada's most important energy resources, oil and natural gas.

We should take note of the fact that this bill does not seek to apply this form of price fixing to the nation's natural resources products as a whole. It does not empower the federal government to regulate the market price of Ontario's mineral production or Quebec's pulpwood or British Columbia's forest products, but rather singles out two commodities, over 80 per cent of which is produced in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, namely, crude oil and natural gas. It assigns to the Government of Canada, to the federal cabinet, the power of political price fixing with respect to oil and natural gas in the areas of interprovincial and export trading. It does this without regard for the province's ownership of these resources, and its constitutional right to their management and control.

The power for political price fixing conferred by this bill should not be confused with normal price regulation by governmental regulatory bodies such as public utility boards and commissions. In these cases, such tribunals fix prices having regard to the cost of service and a fair return on the capital invested to provide the service. This legislation establishes a policy of price control which is altogether different. Political price fixing is the practice of governments arbitrarily fixing the selling prices of certain products, on the basis of any consideration the government says is for the national good, and therefore in the public interest.

As far as oil prices are concerned, this practice was started by the Arab and other Middle East oil producing states. It was introduced for political reasons. There was, on the one hand, a desire on the part of the Middle East nations to attain a more prominent role in world affairs, especially as they related to energy resources. There was, in addition, the overriding political desire to bring pressure to bear on the industrialized nations of the Western World, to deny military and economic support to Israel in the Middle East conflict in which the Arab states and Israel were involved.

These were the political reasons that led to the practice of arbitrarily fixing prices for essential energy resources, and fixing those prices on the basis of considerations that had nothing to do with the availability of supply, and nothing to do with the cost of producing the product. The Arab states at the same time resorted to the threat of a marketing boycott of petroleum products as a further means of gaining their political objective.

As a result of the worldwide repercussions that stemmed from that set of circumstances, Canada has embarked on a similar course, except that the political considerations, naturally, are very different.

Honourable senators are aware that the current well-head price for crude oil of $6.50 a barrel that now prevails in Canada is not a price related to availability of supply, or to the cost of producing the oil. It is an arbitrary price imposed in order to hold domestic oil prices below world market levels, and was part of a government program to protect the consumers of central Canada and the Maritimes from the impact of vastly increased world oil prices.

In conjunction with that decision, the federal government at the same time imposed an export tax on oil going to the United States. That tax was roughly the difference between the arbitrary domestic price and the world market price, and the revenue generated by the tax has been used to subsidize refiners in central Canada and the Maritimes to offset the higher prices of imported oil in order to maintain petroleum products prices at roughly the same level across Canada.

While the $6.50 a barrel wellhead price was an arbitrary price, it was at least arrived at through a series of discussions between the Government of Canada and the provinces. It would not be incorrect to say that the agreement was reached under the shadow of a threat by the federal government to bring in legislation which would enable it arbitrarily to fix a domestic wellhead price if a satisfactory agreement could not be reached. Bill C-32 provides in law the power to regulate oil and gas prices which the federal government threatened at that time.

One of the serious questions honourable senators and the Canadian people have to consider is whether such legislation is necessary and desirable. Certainly there are many people in this country who will subscribe to the position of the federal government when it says such legislation is necessary. There are three major reasons why this is held to be so.

It is pointed out that world oil prices are no longer fixed in any sense by competition in the market place. This is indeed true. It is argued that since the Arabs introduced political price fixing, all oil prices, on a world-wide scale, have become arbitrary and have been fixed or influenced by considerations that have little, if anything, to do with either availability of supply or cost of production.

In the second place, it is pointed out that the commodities to be regulated by this bill are irreplaceable resources, and the continental supply of these resources is dwindling at a rapid rate while oil and gas consumption is still increasing. We are moving on this continent into a position where there will be a serious shortfall, and unless other forms of energy are developed we will be forced to pay ever-increasing prices for imported petroleum products from the Middle East. For this reason there is a valid argument for the government's intervening in this field, and as part of that intervention taking the power of price regulation in interprovincial and export trade.

In the third place, it is argued that the Government of Canada must be in a position to protect the consumers in the non-oil or gas producing provinces from excessive prices which might be imposed by the governments of the producing provinces. In this regard, Alberta naturally is the province most frequently referred to.

All of these are valid concerns; they are positive reasons advanced to support legislation of this kind. But I would urge upon honourable senators the importance of giving at least equal consideration to the negative aspects involved in legislation of this kind.

One such aspect is the consequences in the field of federal-provincial relations, and on the whole question of national unity in this country. We can all agree that that is a subject of great importance, particularly today when there are deep regional divisions and strong feelings in various regions over what they regard as legitimate grievances and injustices.

The federal government says that this legislation is necessary to strengthen its bargaining position in dealing with the oil-producing and gas-producing provinces. I suppose if a man puts a gun at your head and demands your wallet he could say, "I really don't like carrying this gun around; I would much rather not have it, but it does significantly strengthen my bargaining position when I ask you to hand over your purse." That, in a sense, illustrates the role of this legislation insofar as federal-provincial relations are concerned. What it does is effectively destroy the producing provinces' bargaining position with respect to the marketing of their oil and gas. Therefore, it becomes an open invitation for them to seek redress in other areas of federal-provincial relations. That is one of the serious aspects of legislation of this kind. You cannot take away from any level of government rights and powers they regard as their own and expect them to quietly acquiesce. It becomes an open invitation for them to look to some other area of their relationships with the federal government to seek what they would regard as redress for their grievances.

This bill certainly raises the possibility of very serious and prolonged constitutional confrontation. There is a grey area in the British North America Act with respect to the ownership, development and marketing of resources. The federal government certainly has inescapable national responsibilities and broad constitutional powers to discharge those responsibilities. The argument is advanced that the natural resources of this country really belong to Canada as whole, rather than to the particular provinces in which they are located. This argument has recently been advanced frequently, especially at the federal level. However, we must keep in mind that before Confederation the original provinces that brought Confederation about had complete control over their resources. Nowhere in the discussions leading to Confederation can anything be found indicating that those provinces gave up, or thought they were giving up, their rights to the ownership and control of the resources which had been theirs before Confederation.

Alberta and Saskatchewan became provinces in the same year, 1905. Twenty-five years later, when the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements were completed between Ottawa and those provinces, it purported to put Alberta and Saskatchewan in the same position with respect to resources as the original provinces that entered Confederation. Certainly there was no thought or intention on the part of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I do not believe there was any uncertainty with regard to this matter in the minds of the federal authorities that those provinces were giving over any part of their ownership and control of their natural resources. That was the substance of the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements when they transferred resources to the jurisdiction of the provinces, with the exception of certain mineral resources in the national parks and a few other exceptions of that kind.

Under these circumstances it is not hard to see how an impasse can develop between the Government of Canada and the oil and gas producing provinces. Most, if not all, of the oil and gas producing provinces have oil and gas marketing agencies through which these products are required to be marketed. If Alberta declared that it would sell oil only at a price of $9 or $10 per barrel, and the federal government, under the provisions of this legislation, set the price of oil for interprovincial trade at $7 per barrel, what would happen? There would be no place Alberta could sell its oil; that is true. If the federal government would not buy it and would not permit it to be exported it would lead to the absurd position of seeing for how long the province would sit on its oil before it would sell at the federally imposed price.

Such an impasse could become really serious in the field of natural gas, because consumers in other provinces would be in serious trouble if the supply was cut off even briefly. I hope with all my heart these problems will not arise, but I draw your attention to the fact that this type of legislation is an open invitation for such a confrontation. If it occurred it would be disastrous, in my opinion, for this country.

So, when we are considering the advantages and the needs for the federal government to take the kind of powers it is taking in this bill, my plea is that we also take into account the serious negative implications which are inherent in the legislation.

Another very real concern in the Western provinces is the fear that if Ottawa once adopts a policy of political price fixing, the Government of Canada will inevitably be influenced in its price-fixing decisions by the fact that over 12 million Canadians live in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and less than two million in the province of Alberta. Under those circumstances you can understand provincial concern that the federal government, any federal government, in reaching political price-fixing decisions, will tend to err in the interests of those provinces and regions of Canada on which the government must depend for the majority of its political support. That fear is present in the Western provinces today, and I hope the rest of Canada will not make the mistake of ignoring it, and disregarding the potential danger inherent in it. I believe I am correct in saying, because I am repeating what has been said to me by a considerable number of people in Alberta, that the belief is widespread that if 80 or 85 per cent of the oil and gas resources of Canada were located in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec rather than in the sparsely populated provinces of the West, we would not be debating this type of legislation at all.

Honourable senators, these are the kinds of fears that exist, and again I say Parliament must take these things into account when weighing the pros and cons of legislation such as this.

A further negative factor with respect to this legislation is its almost unavoidable adverse impact on future energy resource development. I am speaking specifically of oil and natural gas. Once the principle of political price fixing is adopted there is no possible way those engaged in the petroleum and natural gas industry can know what future oil and gas prices will be. You can project price trends if prices are going to be governed by cost of production and availability of supply and conditions in the world market place. But once price fixing becomes a political decision where the judgment made is the result of political considerations—I am using the term political in the broad sense—rather than economic, there is no possible way that industry can know in advance what the price will be next month, six months or a year ahead.

We have all seen what has happened in the last 18 months, how situations can develop in parts of the world remote from Canada, and within the space of weeks profoundly affect prices in our part of the world. All these things could influence price-fixing decisions, and if you interject this added uncertainty on top of all the confusion that exists today, it cannot but have an adverse effect on petroleum and natural gas exploration and development.

Honourable senators are well aware that, if this country is to get into a position where it can remain self-sufficient in oil and gas production, there must be a tremendous program of additional exploration and development. That is not taking place. Most honourable senators saw the recent reports in financial papers to the effect that oil exploration in Canada today is at its lowest point in 23 years, at the very time when it should be at its peak.

The National Energy Board and provincial regulatory authorities have all published statistical data saying, "In five, six or seven years Canada will face a serious shortfall in its supply of petroleum." That has been known now for almost a year. Yet here we are, still permitting the continuation of conditions which have reduced exploration to the lowest point in 23 years.

I will not weary the house by repeating some of the things that I and others have said before on this subject. The situation has resulted from excessive taxation at both federal and provincial levels, from excessive royalties and controversy over royalties between the federal government and the producing provinces, and from uncertainty and confusion with respect to the extent of government intervention into energy production and marketing. All of those things have created an element of uncertainty and instability which has led to a great many geophysical crews and drilling companies pulling out of Canada. We have lost something like 30 geophysical crews from Alberta in the last year. Figures I saw recently indicated that over 90 drilling rigs had left Alberta and returned to the States or were now operating in the North Sea and in other more attractive areas.

The availability of adequate energy resources is vital to us as an industrialized nation. We are running short, but yet we are permitting the continuation of a set of circumstances which are reducing exploration and development to an alarming degree.

The relationship between those comments and Bill C-32 is that once we establish in law the practice of political price fixing for our two most vital energy resources, we have added another factor which will make it impossible for the industry or investors in the industry to know what the selling price of petroleum products will be at any given time.

The bill refers also to the power to regulate price with respect to export trade. No one can question the authority of the Government of Canada in that field. I make one brief observation. I earnestly hope that in its political price fixing, as it applies to the export trade—in this case this means our trade with the United States, because that is the only place to which we export oil and gas—that the Canadian government will keep in mind the danger, the folly, of isolating those two commodities from the total volume of international trade between our two countries. It has been pointed out in this house that the volume of trade between Canada and the United States is something like $60 billion a year, and that approximately 60 per cent of all of our exported manufactured products go to the United States. If anything happened to that volume of exports, imagine what it would do to employment opportunities in Canada. The great danger, as I see it, is that because we are dealing here with two export commodities which are becoming in short supply, they are very apt to become segregated from the total volume of trade between our two countries. If unwise decisions are made which, while they may seem desirable with respect to oil and gas, seriously prejudice Canada's interests in this total international trade with the United States, we will be the losers.

If ever there was a time when the government of this country should establish and maintain the closest possible liaison with the Government of the United States, it is now, particularly in this matter of international trade. If we can get representatives of the two governments to sit down together, Canada could say, "Look, we are going to have to cut back on the export of our oil and gas, but maybe there is something else we can do in this total $60 billion trade package which will minimize the adverse effects on both countries." I am satisfied we would receive a favourable response from the United States to approaches of that kind.

Some discussions are going on right now on whether there could be an exchange of energy between some regions of Canada and the United States. That is an important matter to consider when long-distance transportation is of concern to both countries. If we can move some western energy to parts of the western states in return for some American energy imports into Eastern Canada, it might be economically advantageous to both Canada and the United States. I am personally very disturbed by what appears to be a great unwillingness, a great reluctance, on the part of the Canadian government to even discuss these possibilities. Any time someone suggests anything like that, immediately the reply is, "Oh, you are talking about a continental energy policy." For some reason or other, that is a bad word and something Canadians shouldn't talk about.

It may well be that in the years to come the best interests of this country will be bound up in this kind of intelligent negotiation with the nation on whom we depend more than any other for our export trade. I am raising this point in the hope that the Leader of the Government will emphasize to his cabinet colleagues, when these matters are under consideration, that Canada's interest can be seriously prejudiced if we insist on singling out oil and gas and treat these products as if they were completely independent of the total $60 billion of trade on which future jobs and the industrial growth of this country depend to a large degree.

In this matter of control of these two vital energy resources, there is a major government concern which the oil and gas industry must recognize and respect. It is obvious that merely raising the wellhead price of crude oil or gas under present circumstances will not provide the additional exploration we so desperately need, unless there are major adjustments in the present tax and royalty structure, and a great deal of clarification of the degree of government intervention in the industry in the days ahead. If we start with satisfactory tax and royalty adjustments, then much of any increase in the wellhead price, instead of going into the treasuries of the federal or provincial governments, would be available to industry for exploration development. The concern of governments at that point would be how to guarantee that the additional revenue would actually go into exploration and development, and not simply amount to a windfall profit for the oil and gas companies. The industry has to recognize the legitimate concern of the Canadian people, as well as the federal and provincial governments, in that respect.

I am afraid there will be a great inclination on the part of governments, both federal and provincial, to want to be the bankers for any fund represented by the increase in wellhead price that should go into exploration and development. I suggest, honourable senators, that such a policy would be a very unwise and a very serious mistake, for it would add still further to the present uncertainties. Political decisions with respect to how exploration and development funds are going to be used would be detrimental in the extreme, but we are going to find a great deal of pressure exerted by socialistic-minded mandarins in government to get governments directly involved in the field of exploration and development, leading to outright government ownership and control. My own conviction is that if we ever adopt such a course, it will result in even more disastrous shortfalls in energy supplies in the future. Such a course would almost guarantee that result.

It will be necessary for governments and industry to get together and develop a formula acceptable to the federal and provincial governments, and to the industry, whereby the revenue generated by an increased wellhead price will go back into exploration and development.

There is no easy solution to that problem, no simple formula, but it is my hope, if this bill is passed, that before the government starts exercising its powers of political price fixing, it will move in the direction of meaningful consultation with the provinces and the industry, to develop a practical formula whereby revenue generated by an increase in the price will be used for further resource development, instead of going into government treasuries or in excess profits to the industry. Such a formula could ensure the additional exploration and development necessary to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people in the years ahead.

It is my hope that this bill will be referred to committee, where the negative as well as the positive aspects will be examined with competent witnesses able to answer the many questions that arise when we are considering an issue as serious as this. I hope both the committee and the government itself will keep in mind that the most urgent requirement in the interests of Canadian consumers is to create in Canada a set of conditions that will stimulate and encourage large scale development of additional new energy resources which, above all else, is the key to adequate future supplies for the Canadian people, and the availability of those supplies at reasonable prices.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I had not planned to speak this evening on Bill C-32. However, some of the remarks made by Senator Manning prompt me to enter at least a partial reply on the part of the government.

I regret very much that Senator Manning has found it necessary to use inflammatory phrases such as "political price fixing." He talked in terms of the "raw power of political price fixing" by the federal government. We then heard what I felt to be one of the most divisive statements I have heard for some time, which was, "We would not be debating this measure that we have before us tonight if the oil were located in Ontario and Quebec." I do not think that is a responsible statement for any honourable senator to make.

Senator Grosart: Come on!

Senator Perrault: What is at stake in this measure, and what prompts this measure, is the wish of a few oil-producing countries, located primarily in the Middle East, for political reasons to increase oil prices to inordinate levels—levels which are not the product of the free operation of the market economy, and not the product of the free enterprise system, but are very much the product of international political price fixing.

The question before us—and the question has been before us for weeks and months—is: Should Canadian oil prices be determined by real political price fixing on the international market? Should the political objectives of the oil-producing nations of this world dictate what Canadian prices shall be? Should the whims of those with political motives of their own determine how much it shall cost to heat Canadian homes and run the automobiles of Canada, whether in Alberta, Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes, the Prairies, Newfoundland or British Columbia?

To drag the red herring of "discrimination" into our consideration of the bill is not really contributing to the debate. I happen to be a Westerner like Senator Manning, and I can tell you that if we ever faced the situation where some vital mineral commodity was being used for blackmail purposes on the world market, if we ever had a situation where a cabal of lumber-producing nations were to drive the world price of lumber beyond sense or reason, I would expect the Government of Canada to take precisely the same kind of action to assure fair domestic prices, because Canadians do not have to be blackmailed for any reason. Would any Canadian government stand idly by and see some outside conspiracy determine that we should increase our domestic price on lumber four or five times? Of course not.

The commodities which are being used in this international game, in this case, happen to be natural gas and oil. That is why the government proposes the action contemplated in this bill.

Clause 49 of this measure states:

The purpose of this Part is to provide legislative authority for measures that will, so far as may be practicable, enable the Government of Canada

(a) to achieve a uniform price, exclusive of transportation and service costs, for gas used in Canada outside its province of production—

Will anyone dispute that objective?

Senator Grosart: Senator Manning did not dispute it. He agreed with it.

Senator Perrault: Continuing:

(b) to achieve a balance in Canada between the interests of consumers and producers in Canada—

Does anyone dispute that?

Senator Grosart: Senator Manning agreed with it.

Senator Perrault: He agreed with certain parts of the legislation, but other statements he made are not compatible with the spirit of agreement.

(c) to protect consumers in Canada from instability of prices for gas and to preserve a reasonable balance between the prices of alternative fuels in Canada—

Is anyone going to object to that?

(d) to encourage the discovery, development and production of a supply of gas adequate to the self-sufficiency of Canada.

These are the objectives, and no right thinking person can dispute those objectives.

● (2100)

The picture given us tonight by Senator Manning is that of a government determined to impose, as he says, through "raw political power," price fixing. Perhaps he has not read the bill. Clause 22 provides:

(1) With the approval of the Governor in Council, the Minister may enter into an agreement with the government of a producer-province for the purpose of establishing mutually acceptable prices for the various qualities and kinds of crude oil produced, extracted or recovered in that province during such period as may be agreed upon and for other purposes considered expedient to carry out the purpose of this Part.

(2) An agreement for the purpose of this Part need not be expressed in any formal document executed on behalf of the parties thereto if the expression of that agreement is contained in reciprocal orders in council issued by the governments concerned.

That is not my definition of "raw political power."

Senator Manning: Read the rest of it.

Senator Grosart: Read Part III.

Senator Perrault: I have read the measure. Of course, the federal government would have to take action in case there is an impasse, but it is exactly and precisely the same kind of power that would have to be exercised by any responsible government where the common good is at stake.

I recall that a few years ago, when Senator Manning was Premier of Alberta, different arguments were invoked with respect to oil pricing. The appeal to the nation was somewhat different then. The appeal to the nation then was: "We know that international oil is cheaper than Alberta oil, but you have to help the Alberta oil industry, and we want access to the eastern markets, even though eastern Canadians may have to pay more for western oil." That was the argument invoked then by Senator Manning when he was Premier of Alberta. Apparently, in his view, there was a different national duty and responsibility at that time on the people in Quebec and Ontario, to whom he has referred tonight. There was a duty, for the sake of national unity, to pay more for Alberta oil to encourage western industry, and Ontario and Quebec cooperated. I say this as a Westerner, a Westerner not always happy about the actions of successive federal governments, a Westerner who believes that the West has not always been understood by federal governments.

Senator Manning: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Manning: Can you tell me when the people of Canada ever paid more for oil from Western Canada than what they would have paid for imported oil?

Senator Perrault: There was a time in the history of oil production in this country—and I would be glad to produce the figures in this chamber—

Senator Manning: I would be glad to see them.

Senator Perrault: There was a time when offshore crude oil was less expensive than the Alberta product. That is a matter of record.

No one has ever been completely happy with the working of Confederation. At times my friends in Newfoundland have felt the same sense of grievance that we in the West have felt. Quebec has felt somewhat like that, and Ontario has had its sense of grievance as well. Surely, though, Confederation is a great experiment in accommodating one another's problems so far as that can be done. It represents a compromise. We do not find perfection in Confederation, but when it is suggested in this chamber that the people of Ontario and Quebec, or of any other province, would be getting a different deal, I think it is fair to say that history does not bear that out. I do not think that basically it is true. As a Westerner, despite our problems, I think we have made a great deal of progress in Western Canada since Confederation.

Alberta today probably has the highest standard of living of any province in Canada, despite the problems it says it has experienced with federal governments. There are some marvellous people there, and they contribute a great deal to federal revenues. However, I find it difficult to accept, as we were told tonight, that because Alberta oil apparently cannot be sold in Canada at higher world market prices that somehow this is wrong and discriminatory, when just a few years ago, when it was felt necessary to sell more Alberta oil, contrary arguments were employed.

The measure before us does not propose unilateral action by the federal government to dictate prices. Clause 50, which refers to natural gas, says:

With the approval of the Governor in Council, the minister may enter into an agreement with the government of a producer-province for the purpose of establishing mutually acceptable prices for the various kinds of gas produced, extracted, recovered or manufactured in that province during such period as may be agreed upon and for other purposes considered expedient to carry out the purpose of this Part.

So, the suggestion is consultation.

One of the continuing problems as far as oil and natural gas production is concerned, as this bill points out, is to promote good levels of exploration. Senator Manning is perfectly correct when he says that there have to be incentives for the companies to continue their exploration, and government must not take all the revenues that come from increased wellhead prices. There have to be opportunities for fair taxation.

Some provincial governments, as honourable senators are aware, have gone considerably beyond the idea of royalties, and under the appellation of "royalties" many other taxes and fees have been established. The whole royalty principle has been so distorted that in some cases it is really tantamount to denying the federal coffers legitimate taxation revenue. We want a fair level of taxation. There have to be reasonable prices, prices which will not be dictated by three or four nations with real political price-fixing motives. There has to be a fair level of profits.

It seems to me that this legislation suggests that reasonable men, sitting down and reasoning together provincially and federally, can work out what is a fair price. This is not the exercise of raw power, and this is not political price fixing. This bill constitutes an effort to provide fair compensation for the companies and for the government, a good standard of supply, and a fair level of price for the consumers of Canada.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on Bill C-33, respecting the export from Canada of cultural property and the import into Canada of cultural property illegally exported from foreign states, which was presented on Thursday, May 1.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, after I presented the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on May 1, it was discovered that the wording of amendment number three presented some technical difficulties and required clarification. This amendment has been re-drafted, and Senator Lamontagne, who sponsored Bill C-33 in the Senate, and who also sponsored the amendments in committee, will present the revised version as an amendment to the report. In the course of his presentation Senator Lamontagne will also explain the other amendments.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, as Senator Carter has just said, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science examined Bill C-33 in detail and made a number of amendments which, if accepted, will certainly improve the legislation.

I now intend to review briefly these amendments, and those who wish to follow this discussion should have a copy of Bill C-33, as well as a copy of the committee report, which appears at page 848 of Hansard of Thursday, May 1.

The first two amendments mentioned in this report are related to clause 8, subclauses (2) and (4). They are identical and designed to meet the same purpose. Honourable senators will recall that the customs officer has to refer an application for an export permit to an examiner when this officer feels that the cultural object might be included in the control list. The examiner must then advise the customs officer to issue an export permit when he finds that the object is not on the control list or when he determines that the object is not of outstanding significance and not a significant element of our national heritage.

In both cases, the two subclauses of the bill require the examiner to send a copy of his advice to the Review Board. There is no objection to this procedure. However, when the examiner gives his advice to issue a permit, the Review Board cannot do anything about it under the authority assigned to it by the bill. But the minister, under clause 12, can amend, suspend, cancel or reinstate that permit. In order to be able to exercise this power, we feel that the minister should also be informed when an examiner is sending to the customs officer his advice to issue a permit.

The first two amendments mentioned in the report would ensure that the minister would receive such information directly and immediately rather than through the board.

The third amendment is related to clause 12, which I have just mentioned. We felt that when the minister amends, suspends, cancels or reinstates a permit, he should be required under the law to send a written notice to the holder of the permit. In a subsequent amendment we have given to the person affected by such a ministerial decision the right to appeal before the Review Board.

Senator Flynn: It is quite obvious, to inform the interested party.

Senator Lamontagne: He was not obliged at all under the legislation.

Senator Flynn: What would have happened had he made a decision and not informed the interested person?

Senator Lamontagne: He might just have notified the customs officer that the permit had been suspended or cancelled. Under the bill, as Senator Flynn will recall, the applicant or the holder of a permit has a certain number of days to make an application before the board, so that he has to be informed as quickly as possible. It is not a major improvement to the bill, but it seemed to us that since we had to amend the bill anyway we might as well improve it in this case.

Senator Flynn: Very good.

Senator Lamontagne: However, the drafting of our third amendment met with some objections from the officials of the Department of Justice. More particularly, they objected to the word "applicant" in our amendment, because when the minister will use his powers under clause 12, the person concerned will not be an applicant any more but will be the holder of a permit. The departmental officials have now submitted a new draft, as Senator Carter has just mentioned, which has been distributed to honourable senators. This new draft would restore the original wording of clause 12 as it appears in the bill, but this original wording would become subclause (1), establishing the power of the minister to intervene in these matters.

Then, according to the wording—again submitted by the officials of the Department of Justice—a new subclause (2) would be added, as follows:

Where the Minister amends, suspends, cancels or reinstates an export permit under subsection (1), he shall forthwith send a written notice to that effect to the person who applied for the permit.

Thus, the second subclause would describe how the minister will exercise the powers conferred upon him by the first subclause, if and when he chooses to use them.

In my view, this new draft accomplishes exactly what the committee had in mind when it approved the third amendment in the report, but in a more satisfactory way, according to the Department of Justice. This is only a technical change.

Honourable senators, at the conclusion of my remarks I will move an amendment to the report of the committee—now that a recent ruling of Her Honour the Speaker clearly enables us to do so—deleting the wording of the third amendment and substituting therefor the new wording.

The fourth amendment in the report is undoubtedly the most important. It is related to paragraphs (a) and (b) in subclause (2) of clause 15. It refers to the composition of the Review Board. As the bill now stands, the minister would be able to appoint only the chairman as an impartial and independent member. All other members would have to be actual members or employees of custodial institutions, or actual dealers in or collectors of art. In view of the role of the board, these persons could face potential conflicts of interest.

Senator Flynn: Probably.

Senator Lamontagne: Although the committee felt that these persons should not by law be excluded from the board, we came to the conclusion that the basis of selection should be considerably broadened. The amendment would enable the minister to appoint, in addition to the chairman, two other completely impartial members. Moreover, persons who have been but are no longer members or employees of custodial institutions, or who have been but are no longer dealers and collectors, would also be eligible. With these amendments, the board will have a much greater credibility and will be in a much better position to be, and to appear to be, fair in the exercise of its complex functions.

I referred briefly to the fifth and sixth amendments when I discussed the proposed change to clause 12. Clause 23(1) now gives to a person who has been denied an export permit by an examiner a right to appeal before the Review Board. These two amendments to clause 23 would also enable a person whose export permit has been amended or cancelled by the minister to request the board to review such a ministerial decision. In my view this is another improvement designed to protect the rights of individuals.

The last two amendments have the same wording and the same purpose. They are related to subclause (2) of clause 23, and to subsection (4) of clause 26. As the bill now stands, the expression, "unless the circumstances of a particular case require otherwise," which appears in these two subsections, can be construed as enabling the Review Board to refuse to review an application for an export permit, or to refuse to consider a request to determine the fair market price of a cultural object. The committee felt that the board should not under any circumstances have the power to refuse to make such a review, or to consider such a request. These two amendments are designed to make sure that the right of appeal will be fully protected, and that the expression, "unless the circumstances of a particular case require otherwise," will apply only to the extension, hopefully, in exceptional cases, of the maximum time limit within which the board must render its decisions.

I believe that the detailed examination of this bill by the Senate and the committee, and the amendments which I have just explained, will make it a better piece of legislation.

It is reported that Thomas Jefferson once asked George Washington why the United States would need to have a second house; that is, a Senate. Washington replied, "For the same reason that I want a saucer for my coffee—so that the hot legislation can be poured into it to cool before it must be drunk." I do not consider this bill to be really hot legislation, but I believe that we are in the process of cooling it so that it can be more easily drunk.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, before Senator Grosart speaks, perhaps I may be allowed, with leave, to move an amendment to the report of the committee. I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter:

That the report be amended by striking out amendment number 3 in the report and substituting therefor the following:

"3. Page 7:

Strike out lines 38 to 41, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"12.(1) The Minister may amend, suspend, cancel or reinstate any export permit other than an export permit issued on the direction of the Review Board.

(2) Where the Minister amends, suspends, cancels or reinstates an export permit under subsection (1), he shall forthwith send a written notice to that effect to the person who applied for the permit."

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, that the report be amended by striking out amendment number 3 and substituting therefor the following—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I am speaking to the amendment proposed by Senator Lamontagne. Having spoken on the bill before, and studied it very thoroughly, I would say that I agree generally with the amendments proposed by the committee, but not entirely with the amendment proposed by Senator Lamontagne. The reason for that is that while this is an extension of the kinds of person who may be appointed to the board, this cooling of the original wording of the bill, as Senator Lamontagne called it, does not, to my mind, cool it quite enough.

Senator Lamontagne: I am sorry. I wonder if Senator Grosart is speaking to the amendment I moved to the report of the committee, relating to the third amendment, or to the fourth amendment contained in the report?

Senator Grosart: I thought I made it very clear. I thought I said that I agreed with the report generally, and was speaking to the amendment proposed by Senator Lamontagne. That is the report that refers to the composition of the board.

Senator Lamontagne: To the fourth amendment?

Senator Grosart: To the amendment, yes.

Senator Flynn: But the question is on this amendment.

Senator Grosart: All right. Let me say, then, that I am speaking to the amendment proposed by Senator Lamontagne. I do not think this changes my remarks. This is the amendment to the committee's amendment number three, and which relates to page 7 of the bill.

What the amendment proposed by Senator Lamontagne does is to give the minister additional powers. I beg your pardon. Senator Lamontagne's proposal refers to the committee's amendment number three. The reason I am perhaps a little confused here is that the way this amendment is worded is not quite in keeping with our rules, which require that the whole sentence should be given.

The third amendment strikes out the words "tion of the Review Board, in which case he shall forthwith send a written notice to that effect to the applicant." This particular amendment was to deal with some doubt, as I understood it, on the part of the officials in the Department of Justice as to whether this person was still the "applicant" or not. To me that is a nit-picking amendment, because really he is still the applicant. He may now have become the holder of a permit, but he is still the applicant.

Now, I should say that I am speaking to the amendments proposed by the committee, and this is in respect to amendment 4, to page 8 of the bill, where the committee has extended the qualifications and categories of persons who may be appointed to this Review Board.

As it now reads, those who may be appointed to this Review Board—and this is perhaps the most important clause in the whole operation of the act—now specifically include those who have been officers, members or employees of art galleries, museums, archives, libraries, or other similar institutions—that is to say, custodial institutions—in Canada, and residents who have been dealers in or collectors of art.

My suggestion is that this should be extended so that the minister can also appoint any resident of Canada competent for the purposes of the act. The reason I say this is that the Review Board is now loaded entirely on the side of those who have a specific interest—a very specific, and perhaps conflicting, interest—in keeping an object of art in Canada. These are persons who have a specific view of this matter, which is not necessarily the view of other residents of Canada. Why should this Review Board be restricted to those people who have a specific interest in this? Normally a Review Board goes beyond this sort of thing. You may want to have a lawyer, a doctor, or an ordinary buyer of these objects of art, and not necessarily a collector. All we have here are professionals, and professional judgment in this field. These people here are all in the same category. There is no provision for a representative of the general public. I do not see any reference here to a representative of consumers of these art objects.

Senator Lamontagne: If I may read our amendment, it refers to the members of the Review Board including the chairman and two other members "who shall be chosen generally from among residents of Canada". That makes three.

Senator Grosart: The chairman and the two original appointees, but the board membership is now increased.

Senator Lamontagne: A maximum of 12.

• (2130)

Senator Grosart: This means there would be only two not in this expert field, and my fear is that the chairman and those two would be from the very same type of grouping. So I would like to see in the amendment some provision for the consumer of these objects to have some voice in this decision that a particular object cannot be exported from Canada except under the conditions of the act—which I shall not go into now because they are quite complex—that is, if no Canadian buyer, institution or otherwise can be found. It seems to me that this board is loaded too heavily with professionals who might have a specific interest in seeing that art object sold, if possible, in Canada at a price lower than it would command in the export market. I am aware of the various qualifications built into the act, so, as I said in speaking to it, one would hope that the effect of the act would not be in any way to decrease the full price the owner of the art object might hope to receive.

As I say, honourable senators, I am still concerned that this board seems to be loaded in favour of professionals, and professionals in this position are not notable for their concern for the public interest—particularly those in the second group. In saying that I am not implying that they have no concern at all for the public interest, but certainly the public interest where a dealer or collector is concerned has a considerably lower priority than some other things might have. My suggestion is that we add to this another category, category (c), from among residents of Canada who will represent the consumer interests in this field.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I understand Senator Grosart is not making a formal amendment out of his proposal. I would say that his concern, as I have just indicated, has already been at least partly taken care of in the sense that at least three members will be appointed generally from the Canadian public.

As far as I am concerned, I think it might possibly be dangerous, or at least undesirable, if we were to indicate that a certain category of the general Canadian public should be included or represented on the board, because then the question would be: Why stop at consumers? What is the specific interest of the Canadian consumer in this legislation? Why not business? Why not labour unions? Why not the churches? It seems to me that the provision in the amendment presented by the committee takes care, to a certain extent, of the worry expressed by Senator Grosart.

In addition, we have, as a committee, further broadened the basis of selection. I say that if this amendment carries, the minister will be able to go far beyond the actual dealers and the actual collectors to all those who have been previously associated with the custodial institutions, who are retired or on pension but who have acquired a great interest and experience in this field, and who would be able, I am sure, to serve in a very impartial way, and have a great deal of time at their disposal to devote to this board.

It seems to me that without bringing further categories into this list, which is already complicated, we should leave the minister some discretion. I hope that in exercising that discretion the minister will choose as members of the board as many people as possible who have been, but who are no longer, actually members of custodial institutions and who are not actually dealers or collectors.

Senator Grosart: I would have to say that if that happens it would generally meet my objections. I was using the words "consumer interests" only to indicate the kind of additional categories of Canadians that might be added.

By the way, I wonder if I could ask the sponsor of the amendment for a definition "ex-collector"?

Senator Lamontagne: I suppose that might be a little difficult, but perhaps Senator Grosart might be classified as a former collector in that I understand he does not buy any more.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Giguère, that the report, as amended, be now adopted.

Motion agreed to and report, as amended, adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lamontagne moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY LEGISLATION

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-60, intituled: "An Act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, may I add several words in explanation of this motion. This is not an unusual proceeding; we have been following it for four or five or six years, and we are now receiving some recognition because the Minister of Finance on several occasions has invited the chairman to proceed as soon as he could with consideration of the tax measures. But I had an unusual, and perhaps I should say a different, experience in the last few days. I received a letter from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, up to the level of parliamentary secretary—

Senator Flynn: That is rather high.

Senator Hayden: Yes, that is moving fairly high. Of course, it depends on how you define it. Your definition may not put it as high, and, of course, you do not know what my definition is. In any event, it has some significance, and I was advised that authority had recently been given by the Cabinet to table the bill in the House of Commons on May 5, which was done. At the same time authority was given by the Cabinet committee to request that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce consider holding hearings on the bill parallel to the proceedings on Bill C-2.

• (2140)

This, of course, is really moving much further ahead, if I am construing the language correctly, and it gives a stronger recognition of the effectiveness in the public interest of the examination that we give to this particular subject matter, in receiving reports, assimilating the views of the public and relating the public interest. I therefore believe that a real service is given by this type of procedure, of which this is just another application.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am pleased to support Senator Hayden's motion. I believe this has been referred to, especially by my deskmate, as the Hayden formula of considering the subject matter of the bill before it reaches us. We have already followed this procedure in respect of three bills during the current session—the Canadian Business Corporations bill, the Income Tax bill, and the Combines bill, the study of which I understand has not yet been completed. Therefore, this is the fourth bill the subject matter of which we will consider in advance of the bill's coming to us.

Senator Hayden: That is correct.

Senator Flynn: I have looked at this bill, and its explanatory documents and background papers. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency bill consists of approximately 224 pages, and is quite extensive. The proposals contained in it represent a substantial revamping of our bankruptcy and insolvency legislation. There is no doubt that this requires substantial scrutiny by Parliament, and there is also no doubt that the Senate is well suited to do that. I support the motion.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 14, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN IN QUEBEC—BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, last night the Leader of the Opposition asked whether the Minister of Justice was considering continuing with charges against the longshoremen at St. Lawrence River ports for not returning to work after Parliament passed legislation ordering them to do so.

The Minister of Justice, the Honourable Otto Lang, has stated that he would not consider prosecutions either under the Labour Code or the Criminal Code of St. Lawrence longshoremen if the men returned to work and complied with the order of Justice Deschênes, which they appear to have done. Of course, if the men did not comply with that return to work order, the minister would have to review the situation in the light of new circumstances.

QUEBEC OFFICIAL LANGUAGE ACT

DECISION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ON PETITION— QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on Thursday, April 24, Senator Forsey, who unfortunately is not with us this afternoon because of illness, asked a question, the first part of which reads:

Has the government made any decision in regard to the petition of the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards and other interested citizens, submitted on February 17 last, for a reference of the Quebec Official Language Act to the Supreme Court of Canada, or alternatively for the disallowance of the said act by the Governor General in Council?

The answer is that the federal government is not disposed to bring the matter of the Quebec Official Language Act before the Supreme Court of Canada.

The second part of Senator Forsey's question was:

If not, when may such a decision be expected?

Senator Croll: You have answered it now.

Senator Perrault: Yes, the second part of that question appears to have been answered during my initial reply, but may I say additionally that the alternative to disallowance will be considered in detail by the Cabinet in the next one to two months.

Senator Choquette: A group of devoted citizens headed by Mr. Scott, I think, who was at one time Dean of the Law Faculty of McGill, is disputing that and taking the case to the Supreme Court of Canada. Am I mistaken?

Senator Croll: No, that is correct.

Senator Choquette: That was not really a question but a statement, but I now wish to put a question. When that case brought by the group headed by Mr. Scott is heard, will the federal government be represented? You might take the question as notice.

Senator Perrault: I will take it as notice and attempt to obtain further information. Whether or not a test of this particular measure does go to the Supreme Court, obviously the government will consider the alternative of disallowance in some detail.

Senator Flynn: May I suggest, as Senator Choquette did on a previous occasion, that you cross that bridge when you come to it.

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Carter moved the third reading of Bill C-33, respecting the export from Canada of cultural property and the import into Canada of cultural property illegally exported from foreign states.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill C-32 to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the bill before us has a long and involved history. Its predecessor was Bill C-18, which was introduced in the House of Commons as long ago as April 2 of last year. That bill provided for many of the current solutions to this problem which have been incorporated in this bill. However, there have been additional provisions and these have become the subject of what I would call rather bitter controversy.

After Bill C-18 appeared on the Order Paper, there were some very serious attempts on the part of the federal government and the provinces to reach agreement on the manner in which the problems arising out of the worldwide petroleum emergency crisis had developed. It appeared for a while as though these negotiations were very successful. Honourable senators will recall that recently the Prime Minister and the premiers got together and reached substantial agreement. That result was hailed as one of those instances in the long history of federal-provincial relations when statesmanship had prevailed and we had appeared to find a way to solve some of these very difficult problems by consultation and negotiation.

Subsequently, however, disagreements arose on various matters in relation to the subject matter of this bill. The government has now decided to introduce Bill C-32, the purposes of which are, first of all, to provide as far as possible a uniform consumer price for petroleum products in Canada, with the one exception of the addition of transportation costs from the source of the product as they apply from province to province.

The purposes of this bill are also to provide statutory authorization for certain measures that have been taken in the interim period, such as the decision announced in the last budget in March to make it impossible for provincial royalties, paid to the provincial government in respect of oil and gas, to be deducted from corporate federal income tax. This has caused a great deal of controversy and we are told that the issue will not be resolved finally until it is taken to the courts for a decision as to the constitutionality of this measure. It is described by those who oppose it as a federal tax on provincial taxes. I am not saying that is what it is. That is no doubt a matter that the courts will decide, since one province has said it will refer this bill to the courts as soon as it is proclaimed.

The main complication we find in the bill, of course, is that it contains some of the major components of what may be a national oil policy. Other bills provide different components of this. I have in mind other government measures such as the one I have referred to, and other acts such as the one already before the House of Commons dealing with the control of what is called "frontier oil", that is, oil in the Northwest Territories, where the federal authority is much clearer than it is in the provinces. There are such measures also as the National Energy Board Allocation Act, which takes over certain of the powers formerly administered by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and sets them up to be administered by a more or less independent board. There are also other acts on the way which will presumably fill out what is called the national energy policy.

The bill itself, as I have said, is complicated and controversial. It is of great interest, of course, to consumers generally. This becomes very plain when we realize the extent of the distribution of the use of petroleum products based on fuel consumption across Canada. Automobile users use 31 per cent, air transport 3 per cent, bunker oil used in shipping and heavy industry 20 per cent, heating oil 22 per cent, oil industry consumption 7 per cent, diesel fuels used in buses and trucks 9 per cent, and other uses such as plastics and petroleum based products, 8 per cent, making up to 100 per cent. So the consumers of Canada have a very vital interest in the bill, its efficacy and its possible spin-offs.

Indicating the importance that parliamentarians attach to the bill, I might say that there were no fewer than 26 speeches in the House of Commons chamber, and I have counted 126 speeches or interventions by members of Parliament that were made when the bill was in Committee of the Whole.

When I speak on this bill I need hardly say that I speak not as a Westerner, not by any means as a dedicated federal centralist, and certainly not as an expert on energy, oil or gas; however, there are many aspects of this bill, in addition to the complicated technical aspects, which are and must be of very general interest. Perhaps the most important of these aspects is that the bill puts the whole question once again smack in the middle of that most persistent of all Canadian problems, federal-provincial relations. This, of course, is why it is a controversial bill.

I think the controversy stems, most of all, from disappointment that the agreement which seemed to have been reached by the federal government and the provinces on a temporary basis has not been made permanent. In the event, the federal government has made what was a temporary arrangement, which was more or less incorporated in Bill C-18, into a permanent statute, and from this, of course, derives some of the dissatisfaction, even the bitterness, that has been expressed by some who oppose the bill, particularly premiers and others representing the two provinces concerned, although it is fair to say that Alberta, by and large, is the province most concerned.

The high hopes that were engendered by that temporary situation have now been dashed to the ground, and the question is: is this bill responsible for that break-up? I am not going to argue today that it is, but I am going to raise the question as to whether this whole matter might not have been handled in a better way. The controversy has been deepened by the fact that negotiations are continuing. This is specifically provided for in the bill. I would say that I have never seen a bill before Parliament which went so far out of its way to stress the importance, in the view of the federal authorities, of the continuity of negotiations. That is to its credit.

On the other hand, controversy has arisen over the wisdom, or otherwise, of the federal government's apparently reverting to an old practice, and that is to take into its own hands the power of unilateral decision on the eve of continuing negotiations. I think anybody who has studied the history of federal-provincial relations will agree that that has been an almost persistent device used by the federal government. I do not use the word "device" in any derisive sense; we are dealing here with some obvious devices to carry on the agreement until it could be made statutory or otherwise resolved. We had temporary agreements. The industry, for example, agreed to collect and remit the import tax on which the equalization of consumer price is based. The government itself, in order to expedite the cash flow of these statements, resorted to the old device of Governor General's warrants. I am not criticizing either of those devices, as they are called. I think no one would deny that this is a bill to deal with an emergency. It is not a normal bill. It may be a temporary emergency. No one knows. The emergency, of course, is the fact that in a little over a year the members of OPEC have multiplied the price of oil to world consumers four-fold. Canada was in the fortunate position of being in net balance on oil production and consumption.

Honourable senators are well aware that, on the basis of rough figures, we import about half the petroleum products we use and we export half of what we produce. It may be in the proportion of 60 per cent and 40 per cent. The figures are not always precise.

We were, as I say, in this fortunate position but then a problem arose because most of the available production for national consumption was owned by one province, Alberta, with a 20 per cent element in Saskatchewan. But that province consumed as much as it produced, with some exceptions related to the quality of the crude petroleum. In this situation, of course, one of the objectives of the federal government, and one with which I do not think anybody would quarrel, was to hold down to a reasonable level the domestic price across Canada—not just merely to equalize it but to hold it down to $6.50 a barrel compared with the U.S. price which, I think, is $9 per barrel, and the international price which is $11 or $12 per barrel. As I have said, I do not think that anybody could quarrel with that objective, but it has raised some serious questions. Is this the right price? What is being done with the windfall? Obviously there is a very great windfall both to the federal government and to the provincial governments concerned—a windfall to both federal and provincial revenues. If the price at $6.50 a barrel yields the tremendous surplus that it is said to yield, then is this a fair price? That is part of the controversy and I am not going to enter into this controversy in those terms at all. But a major question arises out of this. Is this the kind of price level which will perform the most essential service, next to consumer protection, that is required from this national windfall based on oil self-sufficiency? Is this the price which will make it possible for exploration to continue so that after nine years—which is one of the present projections—we will remain self-sufficient?

One of the things that bothers me about this bill and the discussions that have gone on is that nowhere have I seen any suggestion that any government would fully provide for this continued exploration. I say fully provide; it is quite true that both the provincial and federal governments have made moves in this direction. However, it would seem to me that an essential ingredient of the decision as to what is a fair price for Canadians to pay for a provincial resource is that which will continue Canadian self-sufficiency. No such suggestion is built into the bill. I am not saying that is the way it should have been done, but I would like to hear, perhaps in committee, some explanation of why this $6.50 price, which appears to be the price for the time being at least, was agreed on. This may change, of course, but I have seen no discussion of a formal relationship being made between the price that is agreed upon and imposed by the federal government in this very important matter of continued funds for exploration. It may be very difficult to determine what percentage, or what dollar part of the price, should be set aside, but surely it is not beyond the competence of our governments and our technologists to come up with a figure which will assure Canadians that, other things being equal, our potential resources coming through, Canadians will remain self-sufficient eight or nine years from now.

I must say that, although I may be somewhat critical of the attitude of the government in this, I am in no way critical of the major objectives in the bill, which are simple principles, providing as follows:

[Senator Grosart.]

(a) to achieve a uniform price, exclusive of transportation costs, for crude oil used in Canada outside its province of production;

(b) to achieve a balance in Canada between the interests of consumers and producers in Canada;

(c) to protect consumers in Canada from instability of prices for petroleum in the international markets;

Those are the objectives of the bill, and I am sure all would agree that they are objectives with which it would be difficult to quarrel.

The bill, incidentally, in one of its five parts, now brings natural gas under the same type of price restraint and controls as petroleum products. It is interesting to note that here again we have the federal government imposing price controls. This is at least the second time this has happened in bills in the last two weeks. I will not say that I am glad to see the federal government moving into that area. There are still some serious questions as to whether it is better to do it piece by piece and pretend it is not being done, or to come out and say that the government has now decided that price controls are necessary across the board. There has been a great deal of discussion on that, and it is fair to say that the Canadian public appeared to decide fairly recently against the imposition of universal, across-the-board price controls. However, the present government, after opposing it, will very likely wind up with exactly that policy. They are well on the way to it in the imposition of these national price controls on these two commodities. Of course, it is the selection of these two commodities for price controls which has, again, caused some of the controversy. Why these two? The fear of some of those who oppose the taking by the federal government to itself the right to unilaterally decide this issue also stems from the fact that there is some fear that this is the thin edge of the wedge of what some call socialism, some call statism, and it is understandable that there may be persons, industries and provinces which have some fear that this may be just the start. If these two commodities—Senator Manning pointed this out yesterday—why not others? Why stop at these two? What about other components of our energy? What about coal, hydro, nuclear power? It is said that this is a special emergency case. But it is very easy to see where similar emergencies might arise. One would wonder if this policy is to be extended, and to consider what the consequences might be.

● (1430)

Honourable senators might say, "Well, it would be different in the other provinces." Nuclear power might be an example of a case where there might not be this great difference. In the case of Ontario, for example, the province now leads the world in the percentage of its total electrical energy requirements being provided by nuclear reactors. The figure is said to be somewhere between 15 per cent and 18 per cent. I do not think that any similar area in the world, high electrical energy users, would come anywhere near that. The figure of 10 per cent would be the highest one might find anywhere else. Is it possible that some other province would claim the right to share this? On what basis? The basis might well be that the taxpayers of Canada generally have invested at least $1 billion in the particular type of reactor which has been found to be so successful, namely, the CANDU reactor. For over 20 years there have been annual grants to Atomic Energy of Canada to produce this now very excellent reactor. Would some other province in an emergency have the right to claim a share of that action, that resource—which is what it is—because of the very large contribution from public funds to its success?

The federal government, despite those very high objectives, very laudable objectives, appears to have dragged its feet, particularly on one of the solutions to this problem, which is the extension of the oil pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. It is well over a year since the Prime Minister said that Canada was going ahead with it. It is still being argued about. Certainly, had that pipeline been started when it could have been, we would now have less of a problem in respect to the price of imported oil and gas in the eastern part of the country.

Senator Lamontagne: It might have been started in 1958.

Senator Grosart: Senator Lamontagne has made the excellent suggestion that it might have been started in 1958. That was when Canada, for a short period, enjoyed a great vision, one from which we are all now benefiting greatly. Unfortunately that particular subject was not, so far as I know, incorporated in the vision, but it is perhaps interesting, because Senator Lamontagne has raised the point, that the National Energy Board and the first national energy policy were very definitely part of that vision, and Canada, Canadians, and the present government are today benefiting from that.

I am not altogether convinced that the national energy policy, as we have it, in these ad hoc decisions and bits and pieces, is as efficacious as that national energy policy proved to be. The Leader of the Government took rather excitable and violent exception to some of the remarks that were made yesterday. He objected strongly to the phrase used by Senator Manning "political price fixing." Actually, I think it is a realistic term.

Senator Perrault: Nonsense.

Senator Grosart: It is. It is political. It is made at the political level. It is price fixing, price controls. Senator Perrault might have been happier had it been called a federal decision to embrace the concept of price controls. Perhaps he would not then object. It is price fixing. Senator Perrault might regard that as a rather drastic term. I was surprised that he got so excited about it. I was also surprised at his excitement over Senator Manning's statement that had this resource situation, the resource ownership, been on the other foot, the federal government might have acted differently.

Senator Manning's statement, as I heard it, was that this was being said. He did not make it as a statement of his own opinion. I would say to the Leader of the Government that if he has not heard it said on the radio or on television, or if he has not read it in the newspapers, then he has not been following the issue as I assumed he had.

Senator Perrault: Do you believe that?

Senator Grosart: No.

Senator Perrault: Of course not!

Senator Grosart: All I am saying is—

Senator Perrault: Then why repeat it?

Senator Grosart: I am saying it is being said. Why not repeat it?

Senator Perrault: Why voice divisive statements like that?

Senator Grosart: I might call this whole bill divisive. I will speak about that in a moment. I repeat, an argument that has been put forward in respect of the bill does not, in my opinion, make either Senator Manning or me liable to any charge of being divisive. I will go a little further. I am trying to point out that the effect of one of the powers of the bill has been to embitter this age-old controversy about federal-provincial relations. Senator Perrault may object to my repeating another statement that has been made. I had not intended to use it until Senator Perrault raised the question. The statement was to the effect that one of the components of this bill—that is, the decision of the federal government to take on itself the right to make a unilateral decision in this matter—was "a brutal exercise of federal bureaucratic power." That was a statement made in the other place—I am not saying it is true—that it was an exercise of federal power and, in the way it was done, an unwise exercise. I am not saying it was an unnecessary exercise of that power, but again, to use a phrase of Senator Manning's which impressed me, it could well be an open invitation to confrontation from the provincial side.

Granting the good objectives in this bill, we have to ask, "Will it in the long run contribute to Canadian unity or Canadian disunity?" That is why it is important that we have these extreme criticisms brought to the attention of the Senate. They may be extreme, they may be wrong, they may be unfair, but they are part of the controversy, part of the fact that now, when we had seemed to reach a statesmanlike conclusion, we have a bitter, bitter controversy.

This raises the question in the minds of some as to whether this is not part of a deliberate policy of centralists in Ottawa to turn back the clock over the years on the gradual increase by judicial decisions and other happenings of the provincial power versus the federal power.

I am not here to argue whether that would be a good or bad thing, but there is a very strong suspicion—such as the cable TV issue which we have before us in another bill—that there is a deliberate attempt on the part of Ottawa bureaucratic centralists to reassert a degree of federal authority in fields where there has been an assumption of exclusive or at least equitably shared provincial authority. This, of course, is one case, because we are dealing with the federal pricing of a product which—no one has disputed this, so far as I know—is provincially owned completely. We are in exactly that area. Of course, I would not be one to argue that a case cannot be made out for effective national sovereignty. That is probably the greatest issue confronting us as Canadians today. I hope we will continue to remain, as we are now, a nation. On the other hand, we all know that there are strong pulls the other way, both in the East and in the West—strong and dangerous pulls surrounding such matters as cable TV, education, foreign relations, and so forth.

It seems to me that the real question we have to put our minds to in connection with this bill is whether or not it will add or subtract, in the long run, from the concept of national unity, not merely as a sentiment but the fact of national unity or national disunity as it faces us.

It is fair to say that from time to time the provinces have not always been united in respect of provincial rights. In this particular case, it is quite obvious that some of those provinces which oppose the bill were, on other occasions, the first to demand federal intervention to protect their rights. There are also those who support the bill who themselves have been, at times, the loudest and most insistent supporters of provincial rights.

The federal government, of course, has always been aware of this. One suspects that its successes over the years in getting its way has been due to an understanding of the concept of "divide and rule." As long as the provinces have been divided, have not been together, the federal position, the centralists' position, has been stronger. Perhaps that is the way the Fathers of Confederation designed it; perhaps it is the best way to have it. I do not know.

Honourable senators, my concern about this bill is that what appeared to be a statesmanlike agreement between the federal government and the provinces has now been turned into a bitter confrontation. I am sure that all honourable senators will agree that it would have been far better if this confrontation could have been avoided. I am not saying how it could have been avoided. I merely repeat that my concern about this bill is that I am not sure whether it is going to contribute or detract from Canadian national unity.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of Senator Grosart. You maintained throughout your speech that this bill was divisive. I certainly cannot agree with that. Would you consider the federal legislation under the PFRA, initiated in 1935, by which the federal government poured millions and millions of dollars, year after year, into the provinces as divisive legislation?

Senator Flynn: That is the start of a good speech.

Senator Grosart: I would hope I did not give the impression, to quote Senator Lamontagne, that I have maintained throughout my speech that this bill is divisive. If I gave that impression, it was contrary to the impression I intended to give, that being that it may prove to be divisive, which is a different thing.

As to the balance of federal subsidies or expenditures from the public purse in one province or one part of the country or another, I have no opinion as to whether in any particular case the legislation concerned was divisive. Only time will tell whether any particular piece of legislation either contributed or detracted from national unity.

There is some question that some of the regional development policies may not be contributing to national unity. This is the question we have to look at every time this type of legislation comes along. I am not going to be drawn into any argument as to the balance between the amount the federal government has contributed to one province or region of the country as against another.

[Senator Grosart.]

The essence of this bill, of course, is consumer protection, which is an entirely different thing. If Senator Lamontagne wants to discuss whether the contribution of Alberta and Saskatchewan to the national good is too much or too little, that is another question. I am not competent to discuss it. The fact is, at this time Alberta and, to some extent, Saskatchewan are making a contribution back, just as the Prairies and every other part of Canada has contributed back some part of the largesse it has received from the federal government.

On motion of Senator Prowse, debate adjourned.

CRIME AND VIOLENCE

PROPOSED SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fred A. McGrand moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Senate considers it desirable that a special committee of the Senate be established at an early date to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.

He said: Honourable senators, we are in the process of debating capital punishment in this chamber, and that debate is centered around the murder of policemen and prison guards. I feel that men of integrity will refuse to serve as policemen unless they receive greater protection and respect from the public. The underworld would be glad to supply us with men recruited from their own ranks, but what would be the result?

Does capital punishment protect policemen or civilians? The evidence is that it does not. In three years time, the question of to hang or not to hang will be debated again in this chamber, and in 1978 we will know no more about crime and its causes than we do today.

It is necessary to carry out a full scale investigation of crime and its causes in Canada. We live beside the most crime-ridden country in the world, the country with the most guns. We know little, too little, about the magnitude of crime and its causes to deal with it effectively at the present time. Our system of crime control is an unplanned product of history.

James Vorenberg, a scientific adviser employed by the Lyndon Johnson Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, reported:

We lack even the most essential knowledge about crime. We know very little—much less than most people think and newspaper stories would suggest—about the volume, kinds and effect of crime and who are the perpetrators and who the victims are.

● (1450)

If this is true in the United States it is equally true in Canada. After two lengthy debates on capital punishment, Canadians concluded what was already recognized in most civilized societies, that the death penalty is not a deterrent to murder, and we have ample evidence that lengthy terms in prison are not a deterrent to crime and do not reform a criminal. A four-year prison sentence is to many criminals a four-year postgraduate course in crime. A prison sentence does not reform the prisoner. To be facetious, it merely gives crime a bad name, and the prisoner a criminal record.

The crime rate in the United States increased 17 per cent in the first nine months of 1974. In Canada, a Gallup poll reveals that 55 per cent of women are afraid to walk in the evening on the streets in the area in which they live. Crime is increasing as fast as, if not faster than, inflation or the pollution of our air, soil and water. A serious effort has been made to study and remedy the pollution of our environment and to improve our ecology, but no serious effort has been made to study the causes of crime, the trends of crime and what lies behind them.

Much of it is due to the presence of a culture, the attitude of a family, a group or a tribe who are concerned about morality. If morality is established in such a group, law and order does not need to be enforced. Quakers do not commit crimes of violence or murder. Crime is almost nil among the Mennonites and other social and religious groups. Why? Because these groups are pacifists; they preach peace and they practise it. They abhor violence and they avoid the gun culture. They have a built-in reverence for life and have respect for the dignity of life, and without this respect for life there can be no civilization worth while.

To understand crime and the motivation behind it we must do more than consult lawyers, judges and the police. We must consult those who have investigated what the present human being has inherited from his primitive ancestors, and what he has learned by a study of defects in our civilization.

Dr. Anthony Storr is a physician and psychologist of London, England, and the author of several books on man's normal and abnormal aggression. The first paragraph of the introduction to his book Human Aggression reads as follows:

That man is an aggressive creature will hardly be disputed. With the exception of certain rodents no other vertebrate habitually destroys members of his own species. No other animal takes positive pleasure in the exercise of cruelty upon members of his own kind. We generally describe that, the most reprehensive examples of man's cruelty, as brutal and bestial, implying by these adjectives that such behaviour is characteristic of less highly developed animals than ourselves. In truth, however, the extremes of brutal behaviour are confined to man; and there is no parallel in nature to our savage treatment of each other. The sombre fact is that we are the cruelest and most ruthless species that has ever walked the earth; and that, although we may recoil in horror when we read in a newspaper or a history book all the atrocities committed by man, on man, we know in our hearts that each one of us harbours within himself those same savage impulses that lead to murder, to torture and to war.

He comments on the words "brutal" and "bestial" used by so many people to describe what they consider animal-like behaviour in humans. Dr. Storr, and many other researchers who have studied the culture of animal species, came to different conclusions. Eric Fromm, in his recent book The Anatomy of Human Aggression, writes on page 4:

However, man differs from the animal by the fact that he is a killer; he is the only primate that kills and tortures members of his own species without any reason, biological or economic, and who feels satisfaction in doing so.

At page 19 he writes:

Man is the only species that is a mass murderer, the only misfit in his own society. Why should this be so?

Here, honourable senators, I would add that the human female is the only female of any species who deliberately plans and participates in the destruction of her unborn offspring.

It is agreed by most authorities that primitive man was neither cruel nor sadistic. He was a food gatherer and a hunter; he killed to eat, and showed little if any aggression against his neighbours. Cruelty and sadism are by-products of civilization. Most of the worthwhile practices we have in our society are products of civilization on the positive side. Crime, with its cruelty and sadism, is a by-product on the negative side.

What happened to mankind during the period he has been civilized? Only anthropologists and ethologists have the answer. They say that the jungle is an orderly place. They say that it is governed by the cultures of the many species who live there; it is a question of the predator and its prey. They do not destroy their environment, and by some understanding between themselves they control the birthrate when the food supply is low.

Animals are good parents; they provide for their young. The young animal in the group that misbehaves a little is disciplined, but never punished physically. Animal ethologists who have studied the culture of many species of animals state emphatically that cruelty among animals is a myth; cruelty among humans is a grim reality, and the so-called bestial and brutal conduct of some persons is a human, not an animal, phenomenon. The real jungle is made by humans for humans.

It is different in human society. Physical punishment or loss of freedom or death have been the methods used to maintain law and order. The idea of punishment as the law interprets it seems to be that inasmuch as a man has offended society, society must officially offend him. It must be a tit for the tat that he has committed; the tit must be more damaging than the tat. With this tit for tat formula society attempts to make the punishment fit the crime.

Most men and many animals can learn through discipline, never by punishment, because in punishment there is no rapport between the teacher and the pupil. Punishment is given in vengeance, not in justice. Animals which are trained to perform in the service of people are not trained by punishment; they perform best by encouragement and for a reward. Can you imagine a seeing-eye dog at its best if it feared punishment rather than expected reward? Would you expect a juvenile offender at the beginning of a criminal career to be rehabilitated by punishment? He could be taught by discipline that he understands, not by punishment that he resents.

A criminal who received the cat-of-nine-tails three times for crimes he had committed was asked which he preferred, the lash or a short prison sentence. He answered that he would take the lash because it only hurt for three days, and the scars on his back would heal in a short time; the only ones that remained were the ones in his mind.

In centuries past, witches and heretics were burned at the stake to rid the world of evil. Lunatics were lashed "to beat the devil out of them." These methods all failed—corporal punishment or lack of freedom can do no better now.

A criminologist has pointed out that the discoveries of Sigmund Freud, and other scientists, at the turn of the century, led to new understandings of human behaviour and made a tremendous impact on almost all aspects of human life—all except the law.

Most criminologists agree that there is no preventive value in putting one wretch out of sight. It merely puts his problem out of sight and does nothing to prevent another person with a similar frustration, but with a different problem, from committing the same offence against the same law.

An inmate in a penal institution and an inmate in a mental hospital have much in common. Both groups are confronted with problems, both suffer from frustration, neither group can cope with their problems, both need treatment. But the success in the mental institution is much greater than in the penal one. Mental hospitals are being reduced in size; penal institutions are growing larger. Seventy per cent of patients admitted to mental hospitals are discharged within a few months of admission. Seventy per cent of prisoners receiving penological treatment in jails are doing so for the second, third or fourth time.

In mental hospitals patients get treatment they wish for. In the penal institutions, prisoners get treatment in the form of punishment and against their will. It is the difference between treatment and punishment; treatment leaves no scars, punishment leaves scars, if not on the body then on the mind.

Beyond the thousands who are locked up and relocked up, released and re-arrested, retried and resented, a much larger number of offenders are never detected, never convicted, never treated in any way. They continue to live in that grey area between normal and abnormal behaviour, unnoticed, until they commit a serious offence.

Whenever we discuss crime and criminals, the terms "psychopath" and "psychopathic personality" are part of the discussion. Aggressive psychopaths show in their early years abnormal behaviour in relation both to people close to them and towards society as a whole. They show a disregard for the truth. It is partly the result of an inability to distinguish truth from falsehood, and a tendency to take fantasy for fact. They have no confidence in other people and they lack self-reliance. They do not conform to discipline—punishment makes them worse. About 2 per cent show abnormality in sex chromosomes. About 25 per cent show abnormality in the electrical rhythm of the brain. Most of them come from homes where the golden rule is not observed. They start as sociopaths. Their disabilities increase as they develop emotionally.

No one was ever born a psychopath. Psychopaths are not born, they are made. What chance has a boy in a home where the father is dishonest or too lazy to do an honest day's work, and the mother is a shoplifter; where the virtues of honesty, thrift and truthfulness are never taught; where everyone watches crime on television; where children never receive paternal love, and where life has no dignity?

These children do not grow up as children from normal homes. In school they are set apart from other children because of their speech, their manners or their clothes. They play on the hot asphalt of the sidewalk in the summer heat, or in the alleys between the houses, and they cannot sleep during the hot summer nights because of noise from the expressways. And what do they learn from the crime programs day and night on television?

During the 1950s when the crime comic made everyday reading for children, Dr. Frederick Wertham, a New York psychiatrist, investigated some twenty murders in the United States, and found that each of them was carried out in detail as described in the latest issue of a crime comic book. If this was the effect of crime comics, what is the effect of crime on television?

An article in the Globe and Mail on April 6, 1973 reported on crime in New York City as follows:

On a recent day, thirteen youngsters were being held at Spotford, the city's main children's jail, all accused of murder.

That article did not refer to them as "youths" or "teenagers" but as youngsters. There were thirteen of them in one jail, in one city, in one week, all accused of murder! If anyone were to investigate the background of these children, what would he find in their home life?

For the past ten or fifteen years the battered child syndrome has gradually been gaining public attention. Articles, and even books, are written about the large numbers of children who are maltreated by one or both parents. It is more common than we think.

A few years ago the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in England investigated 112,000 cases of cruelty by parents to their children, and in 39,000 cases the damage was severe enough that charges were laid against the parents. Another group investigating child abuse researched a family back for the past five generations, and found that severe child abuse had passed from generation to generation. They found that of the 49 children involved in these generations, 42 had been severely abused by their parents.

Harvey Lee Oswald, who murdered President John Kennedy; Sirhan Sirhan, who murdered Robert Kennedy; Earl Ray, who murdered Martin Luther King; and Charles Manson, who was involved in the mass murders in California, were all severely and repeatedly beaten by their parents in early childhood. Children who are robbed of their dignity in early childhood by parents or teachers never have confidence in their home or society that the school represents.

The problem of child abuse comes up frequently. It is estimated that deaths due to child abuse in Britain number from 500 to 700 each year. That is only the tip of the iceberg. Apart from the bodily damage, think of the thousands who are emotionally damaged, mentally deranged and socially disoriented, and who show up in later years as mentally and socially damaged candidates for mental and penal institutions. And that is the problem we do not see, and know little about. Not enough research has been done on this problem.

● (1510)

Dr. Edward Lenoski, of the Department of Pediatrics of the University of Southern California, has done some research in this field. He investigated 712 cases of child abuse, and compared them with 500 children treated in the same hospital and who had never been abused. He concluded that the mother who does not see, hear or smell her baby at the time of birth is the one most likely to abuse the child later on. He found ten times as many had been born by Caesarian section; twice as many were premature, and twice as many had complicated births. These circumstances had deprived the mothers of contact and identity at the time of birth by sight, sound and smell. He also found that 91 per cent of the abused children he investigated were not accidental pregnancies, but wanted or planned pregnancies.

Someone in the other place has suggested that we investigate the cause of the battered child. Others suggest an investigation into vandalism, and still others want to investigate increases in the crime of rape. Some want to study the increase in the number of abortions. Why do a piecemeal investigation? Why not investigate the causes of, and the trends in, crime? I do not think we can go back to primitive man, who was a food gatherer and hunter, and who was neither cruel nor sadistic; but as man became civilized he left evidence along the trail, and it should not be difficult to identify.

It is usual for society to protect itself against what it most fears. We fear cancer and spend millions on research. We fear heart disease and spend millions on cardiac research. We spend millions on research on organ transplants, and millions are spent in researching physical ailments. We fear crime, we hang or punish criminals, yet spend next to nothing on research into the causes of crime. The truth is that we know less about crime than we do about cancer. We do not try to find the causes, because we think we have the answer, and we think that that answer is punishment.

In our western civilization there have been more laws passed for the protection of property than to protect people. At one time there were over 200 crimes that called for the death penalty, and most of them were for the protection of property. That is easy to understand, since a very small minority of the population owned most of the property and they made the laws. The majority of the population owned no property; they owned their lives, and lives were expendable.

Some years ago the body of a Toronto nurse was found on the banks of the Saint John River, a few miles below Fredericton. She had left Toronto in her car on her way to Halifax, accompanied by an unidentified male passenger who wanted a ride to Nova Scotia. Several months later the body of a young woman was found in a gravel pit near a northern Ontario town. Someone was able to identify the car seen at the gravel pit near the time of the murder, and its driver, a casual labourer aged 30, was arrested. The car proved to be the one owned by the nurse whose body was found on the banks of the Saint John River. This man was convicted and hanged.

It is not logical that a man of 30 could commit two psychopathic thrill murders within a few months, and not show evidence of a psychopathic personality at an earlier age. How could a psychopath go unnoticed for so long a period of time? What about his early childhood? What was his early home life? Was he a battered child? What was his relationship with the children he played with? What was his conduct at the age of 10? What were his frustrations at the age of five?

In 1973 a young man of 21 in the Toronto area came before the court for murder. A lady who knew something of his childhood gave this information: "He was one of two boys, aged three and four, from a broken home, who were placed in separate homes. Each night he cried himself to sleep calling for his brother." What frustrations did he suffer, and how did they affect him?

It is these children who become the future dropouts of our society. Why are these unfortunates not recognized at an early age, before puberty? It is easier to rehabilitate ten such persons at the early stage of their delinquency than to try to rehabilitate one adult.

Infants develop habits early in life. They learn to recognize the mother's voice when they are only a few days old. A child recognizes its mother by sound long before it does by sight, and a rapport and security is established. What about the child who has never developed that rapport and security—the child that left the hospital where it was born and went to an orphanage and into a babble of voices; the child who never knew the familiar face of its mother, never developed confidence in any one person and left the institution a few years later with frustrations and fixations? These are the boys most likely to bully smaller children, set fires, torture pets, and show evidence of unsocial behaviour.

Dr. Nathan Blackman, senior consultant at the Social Maladjustment Clinic at the mental health centre in St. Louis, and his assistant, Dr. Daniel Hellman, made a study of 84 prisoners charged with aggressive crimes, and published their conclusions under the title, Enuresis, Fire Setting and Cruelty to Animals: a Triad Predictive of Adult Crime. Dr. Blackman reports that 80 per cent of our criminally violent patients displayed at least two of these symptoms during childhood, and suggest that children who show two of these symptoms should be put under observation.

Professor James T. Mehorter, Professor of Psychology at the Vermont Medical School, has done much research on this subject. In an address delivered some years ago, he discussed "psychopathic personality," "sociopathic personality," and "character neurosis." He described the psychopathic personality as destructive, quarrelsome, sulky, obstinate, defiant, boastful, rebellious, cynical, affectionless, selfish, restless and purposeless. He said:

He lacks a super-ego or conscience, shows a general moral and ethical blunting, and a noticeable lack of sympathy and aesthetic sentiments. Perhaps the most readily observable trait is his lack of sympathy and affection. The pain and suffering of humans and animals does not touch him. Quite the contrary; his behaviour is frequently aggressively cruel. He may take a sadistic pleasure in inflicting pain or seeing pain inflicted.

The message in Professor Mehorter's address is as follows:

● (1520)

I often urge my students in mental hygiene to tune their TV's to a boxing bout for a first-hand study of manifest hostility and aggression. I suggest that they ignore the boxers and closely observe the spectators; for here is an almost perfect example of the raw disintegrative emotions at work. I suspect that the spectators at such events as bullfights, chicken fights, dog fights, rodeos, and other decadent pastimes afford an equally interesting study. Of course, these spectators are not all psychopaths, but the basic psychopathic pattern is there; and it is conceivable that a sizable number of the spectators could be diagnosed as pre-psychopathic.

The sentence, "Here is an almost perfect example of the raw disintegrative emotions at work," is the nub of his message.

It is true that many people enjoy seeing pain, suffering or humiliation imposed on someone or something. A few years ago, one of the participants in a scheduled wrestling match in a maritime city was known as a bad man in the ring. A few hours before the match he was interviewed by the news media. He was asked about his career, and was then asked what was his greatest ambition. He promptly replied, "To kill a man in the ring." We all know that this was sales talk for the box office, and it worked. That night, the largest audience in the history of that arena showed up for the bout. They came to learn if his ambition would be realized. Professor Mehorter is right when he suggested to his students that they watch the audience, not the boxers, when they tune in on a boxing match. If Professor Mehorter were to assess the number of gun faddists who roam the countryside with guns, he would consider many of them pre-psychopathic.

Dr. Carl Menninger, a well-known psychiatrist and criminologist, writes as follows:

The inescapable conclusion is that society secretly wants crime, needs crime, and gains definite satisfaction from the present mishandling of it. We condemn crime; we punish offenders for it; but we need it. The crime and punishment ritual is part of our lives. We need crime to wonder at, to enjoy vicariously, to discuss and speculate about and to deplore. We need criminals to identify ourselves with, to secretly envy and to stoutly punish. Criminals represent our alter egos—our bad selves—rejected and projected. They do for us the forbidden, illegal things we wish to do, and like the scapegoat of old, they bear the burden of misplaced guilt and punishment, the iniquities of us all.

That is a sweeping statement coming from a man who has investigated crime and criminals for nearly half a century—a man outstanding in his field.

The moving picture business needs crime and violence to stay in business making murder and horror films. The more horror and sadism, the greater the audience, the greater the profits, the greater the challenge to make a more extreme film.

Early in 1974, a film showing violence and racial tension was shown in Boston. Three days later, four young blacks poured gasoline on a white woman and set her on fire; and three young whites, two aged thirteen and one aged twelve, poured lighter fluid on an elderly man sleeping in an alleyway and set him on fire. No doubt, the producers of that film will make a story about these burnings as the plot for an even more sadistic film.

The big money in crime is not represented by the little fellow who robs a bank or service station. Big crime is big business. Big violence in professional sport is big business.

Crime and violence has something to do with our western culture. Much of our literature was an outgrowth of Greek, Norse and Celtic mythology, where two-headed and dragon-faced monsters devoured innocent people. Shakespeare's vivid description of some thirty ghastly murders did not help it any.

In 1970, over 60 accidents, some of them fatal, occurred in Los Angeles from children carrying loaded guns in school. In Chicago and Detroit, the murder capitals of the world, boys carry guns in school as a prestige symbol. An eight-year old boy quarrels with his eight-year old companion, pulls a gun and shoots him. A twelve-year old boy shoots his teacher when she criticizes his homework; and a seventeen-year old high school student, who belongs to his school rifle club, attends a rifle practice and then goes berserk, shoots and kills three people and wounds seven others. This youth must have shown psychopathic tendencies. Why was he permitted and encouraged to practise with firearms?

On January 21, 1975, the Globe and Mail reported on the address delivered by Dr. Margaret Mead before the World Federation of the Mental Health Secretariat at the University of British Columbia. She discussed the reason why the murder rate in the United States is ten times that of Canada, and puts the blame on guns and the dedication of the American people to the gun culture. It is of interest to note that about 18 months ago the National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals of the United States, composed of former governors, police officials and judges, urged the outright confiscation of hand guns now owned by private individuals.

This is an outgrowth of the American gun culture. It has flourished in North America, and it grew up in the western United States. After Samuel Colt invented the revolver, everyone in the wild west carried a gun. Gunmen became folk heroes, including Buffalo Bill, who boasted that he shot his first Indian at the age of twelve. Outlaws in the west with guns on their hips boasted that God didn't make all men equal, but Mr. Colt did.

New Zealand is a country with few guns. It is one of the countries with a low crime rate. About a year ago I read a report on crime in New Zealand. There are only five persons in New Zealand penitentiaries serving life sentences, and only 27 serving terms of five years or more. Americans tourists, when they visit New Zealand, wonder why they can walk the streets of any city, at any hour of the night, and not be attacked or robbed. New Zealand is fortunate; it is separated from the United States by the broad Pacific Ocean. Canada is less fortunate. It lies beside the most crime-ridden country in the world—the country with the most guns.

There is something awesome about the lethal power of a gun. People fear it and are fascinated by it. On this continent it has become a part of our way of life. Truck drivers in a recent strike in the United States did not hesitate to use heavy rifles to wound or kill other truckers not in agreement with them. They were not criminals, as we recognize them; they regard themselves as respectable citizens, but they wanted to demonstrate that their demands could be met through the power that comes from the muzzle of a gun. And many youngsters, who believe that they are at the lowest level of the pecking order, wish they had a gun to demand satisfaction. There is no doubt that the gun culture is associated with the declining value we put on life.

This chamber is regarded as the place of sober second thought, where Parliament takes a long second look at legislation. I suggest that it take a first serious look at crime and make an in-depth study of crime and its causes in Canada. When I suggest that the Senate appoint a committee to study the causes of crime and expose the origins of crime, I do not mean a committee that will take two or three years to complete its study, and cost half a million dollars. Of course, it will be only an academic discussion. Most things worth while start as academic discussions.

Everyone should know that our penal system is a complete failure, and that punishment is not the answer. We will always have crime, but if the boy with emotional problems is rescued at an early age, before puberty, the crime rate will go down. Many of them will never be first-class citizens, but they will learn to live within the law.

Many investigations of our penal system have taken place in the past 25 years, but the crime rate has gone up, not down. It has been proven that the death penalty does not deter murder, and long prison terms do not reform criminals. No one suggests that prisons should be abolished overnight, because there are prisoners who should not be allowed to circulate freely in society. But prisons could be phased out within one or two generations, and as they are phased out, a better system should be phased in. It is easier to retrain ten young people with criminal tendencies before the age of puberty than it is to retrain one adult. Put the young criminal back in school.

If such an investigation is undertaken by this chamber, we should forget about the lawyers, judges and police. Consult the psychologists, ethologists and anthropologists. They understand human behaviour, past and present. And call in some ex-convicts who have made good—they know what crime is all about.

I want to mention one criminal who made good. Senator Greene mentioned him last Thursday. In 1924 the United States was shocked by the gruesome murder committed by Loeb and Leopold in Chicago. Two wealthy young university students, each with a high I.Q., planned and carried out a thrill murder. They murdered a younger companion. They were defended at the trial by Clarence Darrow. He was not only an able criminal lawyer, but an equally competent psychologist. Anyone who wishes to understand Darrow's knowledge of what makes a criminal should read his address to the jury.

They were found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment. One refused to submit to the prison routine and was murdered by a fellow prisoner. The other prisoner decided he would rehabilitate himself. He observed all the prison rules and, after many years and many efforts, he was granted parole. And then a new career began. He went to Puerto Rico, where he served for ten years as an X-ray technician, and later as a social worker at the Castaner Hospital. At the age of 55 he returned to school and earned a Master's degree in social work. After graduating, he served four years as research associate and project director in the Department of Health. He spent a year as consulting sociologist to the urban renewal and housing administration, and became chief research associate in the medical school of the university.

There are thousands of inmates in our penitentiaries who should not be there, and would not be there if their problems had been recognized and treated in childhood.

At the beginning of this century, mentally ill people were called lunatics, and the buildings that housed them were called lunatic asylums. Inmates were committed by a magistrate and escorted there in the custody of a policeman. Going to a lunatic asylum was no better and no worse than going to jail, and the inmates ran away every time they got a chance. It is different today. There is a rapport between those who give psychiatric service and those who need it. Many people at social gatherings talk as freely about their psychiatrists as they do about their reducing diets or their horoscopes. Mental illness has lost its stigma. The mentally ill are now part of the human family.

If the young offender is sent back to school and has the proper guidance, in a teacher-pupil relationship in the classroom and workshop, he can develop a better set of values. Many patients who receive care for their emotional problems will keep in touch with mental health clinics, and go for help when they feel there is a need. The day may come when a young person, burdened with frustrations to the point where he feels he may break the law, will approach a clinic of his own volition and ask for help. How can society develop the rapport in the field of delinquency and crime that now exists in the mental health clinics? That is the problem. This is all part of the wide field of mental health. Less than a century ago, inmates of penitentiaries and asylums were referred to as the "legions of the lost." First we must know more about crime and its causes.

Dr. Carl Menninger reviewed the part that Lee Oswald played in the murder of President Kennedy with these words: "Respected and dignified authorities solemnly accumulated volumes of evidence to prove that he, and he alone, did this foul deed. Our part in it is rarely, if ever, mentioned." And then he added, "Perhaps our worst crime is our ignorance of crime." That is why I move that the Senate of Canada carry out an in-depth study of the causes of crime in Canada.

We do know that the United States not only has the most violent television programs in the world, but is the most violent society in the world. In Scandinavian countries, where there is less violence on television and better gun control, the murder rate is only one-tenth of that of the United States. According to an interview with Barry

Crane, published in the Globe and Mail on April 5 of this year, there will be more crime on TV. He explained that the reason for more violence on TV is that violent films are the only ones that pay a profit at the box office. He said that last year he produced two non-violent films, and lost money on both.

In the meantime, we live in a cult of violence. Women are no longer safe on the streets, children no longer safe in their own backyards, unborn children are not safe inside their mothers' bodies, and policemen will continue to be killed on duty. If we pretend to make laws concerning criminality, and if we pretend to define the punishment for criminality, then we have a moral obligation to know all we can about criminality.

Senator Greene: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I am sure he does not believe, any more than the rest of us, in any inquisitorial procedure. How is this committee to be limited in its functions so that it be not a witch-hunt to try and find evidence of crimes? Will it have the ability to subpoena witnesses, which would involve self-incrimination? I think the Star Chamber was abolished in the seventeenth century.

● (1540)

While agreeing wholeheartedly with the honourable senator's motivations, I wonder how, in the broad wording of his motion, he can prevent this from being another witch-hunt to find evidence of crime rather than a medico-socio-economic survey of the reasons.

Senator McGrand: I do not want to make another speech. I think if you read over what I said, and think about it, you will understand it. However, if you do not agree with me this afternoon you will not agree with me tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.
The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Senator Hays presented Bill S-24, to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Senator Hays moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 20, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to outline briefly the work before us for next week, beginning with the committee meetings scheduled. On Tuesday, the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, and the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy, will meet at 9.30 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will continue its consideration of Bill S-19 at 11 a.m. and at 2 p.m. The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will meet at 5 p.m.

On Wednesday morning, at 9.30 there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-60. The committee will also deal with Bill C-32 should that bill have been referred to it. In the afternoon the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy has a meeting scheduled for 3.30. Also at 3.30 p.m. and/or when the Senate rises, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet to continue its study of the Manpower Estimates. A meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill S-5, the Aircraft Registry Bill, has also been called for 5 p.m.

On Thursday morning, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 9 a.m. to consider Canadian relations with the United States. The Committee on National Finance will hold another meeting on the Manpower Estimates at 9.30 a.m. The Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee will meet at 11.00 a.m. and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will also meet at 11.00 a.m. In the afternoon, the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3.30, and the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy has called a meeting for 8 o'clock in the evening.

● (1410)

In the Senate, the bill to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada has been set down for second reading on Tuesday next, and we will, of course, continue with the unfinished items on the Orders of the Day and the inquiries and motions scheduled for next week. In addition, a bill may come to us from the other place.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Concerning the notices, I would like to put a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. At the request of a number of senators, I believe the notice is being sent to their offices in their home constituencies or cities. Is a copy also sent to our offices here in Ottawa? The leader will readily understand that if the notice is sent from Ottawa on Friday morning to a place like mine, for instance, it seldom gets there on Monday or Tuesday. It gets there on Tuesday evening or Wednesday morning. If the notice is also sent to our offices here, in the Senate, our secretaries can inform us ahead of time.

Senator Langlois: In answer to that question, I know for a fact that the notice is sent to the honourable senators' home address. As for sending another copy to their Ottawa office I do not know. I would, however, call my honourable friend's attention to the fact that the statement is included in Hansard on Thursday of each week, and a copy of it should be on his desk on Monday morning, or Tuesday morning at the latest.

Senator Asselin: I understand, but I say this is not a bad procedure. However, if such notice is sent to the home or business address, it does get there in time. If the same notice were also sent to our office in Ottawa, we might hear of it sooner from our secretary.

Senator Langlois: I shall be pleased to take my honourable friend's request under consideration.

Senator Asselin: This is not a complaint.

Senator Langlois: If the situation can be improved, I will see to it with pleasure.

[English]

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, did I hear the Deputy Leader of the Government say that the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations will meet at 9.30 a.m. next Thursday? I thought I heard "9.30 a.m." The meeting is, in fact, scheduled for 3.30, and I want to point out that the Committees Branch has made this mistake before. Last week it was announced in the chamber that a meeting of this committee would be held at 9.30 a.m., whereas it had been scheduled for 3.30 p.m. This erroneous information also appeared in our notice of committee meetings. I was just wondering if it is too much to ask the Committees Branch to get it right.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, with all the committee meetings scheduled for next week, I hope that the absolutely chaotic situation that we experienced this morning will not be repeated. Four committees were scheduled to meet either at 9 or 9.30, and problems were encountered in starting both the joint committees and the standing committees. As in the case of Senator Asselin, I am not complaining or criticizing—

Senator Grosart: Why not?

Senator Lafond: —but I think I should draw attention to this situation and suggest that we apply ourselves to it pretty soon so that our committees can function efficiently.

Senator Langlois: I suggest that Senator Bourget, as the coordinator of committee meetings, should comment on this.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bourget: I can understand why some honourable senators are laughing. A small committee of Senator Cook, Senator Macdonald and myself has been trying for the past two months to achieve some understanding between our committee chairmen. It is very difficult to arrive at a satisfactory agreement, but we are not discouraged and will continue our work to the best of our ability, such as it is. In order to devise a workable system, we must have the support of all honourable senators, and the committee chairmen will have to get together and come to an agreement that will put them on an equal footing.

I fully realize the purpose of Senator Lafond's question. He told me about it yesterday, and I informed him that we are doing our best. I hope with the support of our two leaders, and I know both are anxious to see this problem solved, to arrive at an understanding so that at least by next fall we will have a workable arrangement.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have at this time some further replies to questions which were posed earlier.

On Thursday, May 8, the Honourable Senator Argue asked a question with respect to the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. Recently, the Honourable Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, stated that there will be no change in Crowsnest Pass freight rates unless there is a consensus among farmers for a change in rates. As well, the minister has speculated about alternate forms of assistance to farmers to replace support found in the current freight rates, but these comments were only for discussion purposes. I can inform the Senate that Mr. Carl Snavely will be commencing shortly a six-month study with respect to the cost and revenue implications of moving Prairie grains. The study will assist the government, the minister and the farmers in their consideration of this important national issue. However, it should be repeated that unless there is a consensus among farmers in support of a change in rates, no change will be made.

Senator Flynn: May I put a supplementary question to the leader? Since when has the minister responsible for the Wheat Board also been responsible for freight rates? I thought this came under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable the Leader of the Opposition is quite correct in his assumption. However, may I say that the opinions received from Mr. Lang reflect the views of the government. However, as I say, the Leader of the Opposition is quite correct in his observation.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF COASTAL WATERS FROM RADIO-ACTIVE POLLUTION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the second question to which I have a reply was directed by the Honourable Senator Heath on Thursday, May 8, and it related to foreign nuclear submarines and the protection of West Coast waters. It is the view of the government that the threat of nuclear pollution from American nuclear submarines visiting the nuclear base at Bangor, Washington, is unlikely on the west coast of Vancouver Island. The view is held that American nuclear submarines would pass only through American waters during their passage to the Washington nuclear submarine base, and that the precautions taken to prevent nuclear pollution from this potential source are as rigorous as any safety measures with regard to any nuclear installation.

Of course, if an American submarine wished to pass through Canadian waters, the Canadian government's permission would have to be obtained. The government feels that the best way to prevent nuclear pollution of the kind envisaged by Senator Heath is through multilateral discussions among nations in the nuclear group in order to achieve agreements with respect to the safest and most effective use of nuclear energy.

DECISION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ON PETITION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I now have a reply to the question asked by the Honourable Senator Choquette yesterday afternoon. This is in reply to the honourable senator's supplementary question on the Quebec Official Language Act, as to the federal government's position should an individual or group seek to test the law's validity in the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1420)

I have been informed that in such event the Minister of Justice would consider the opportunity to be represented, but no decision as yet has been made on this point by the government.

TAX TREATIES

COUNTRIES WITH WHICH CANADA HAS CONCLUDED TREATIES OR CONVENTIONS—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, could I ask a question of the Leader of the Government arising out of a question I asked him on May 6 and his reply on May 8? The question relates to tax treaties or conventions between Canada and certain countries in the matter of double taxation and fiscal evasion. I asked, in effect, with what countries we had such tax treaties or conventions, or with what countries we were negotiating revisions of existing treaties. In reply the Leader of the Government named a total of 38 countries; that is, 38 out of 124 member nations of the United Nations. I wonder if he would follow up his answer and supply the house with information on, first, the names of any countries with which we may have existing treaties in this category but which are not being renegotiated, because he has given me that answer? Secondly, the number of other countries with which we have no such treaties and some indication of the status of Canadians in their relations with those countries with which such treaties or conventions do not exist?

Senator Perrault: I will take that question as notice and will endeavour to obtain the reply as soon as possible. I believe those figures should be readily available.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on this bill because of its importance to Canada. My particular interest in it lies, of course, in the fact that I come from the province of Alberta, which has the major concern as a producing province. It should not be forgotten, however, when we are discussing this question of the producing provinces, that, while Alberta has the appearance of being the major source of oil to which other parts of Canada will look for supplies, the fact is that British Columbia and Saskatchewan have very large supplies of petroleum products, but which, unfortunately, do no more than meet most of their own local needs and leave no net for export. A small amount of oil from Saskatchewan does go into the export market, because it is close to that market, but that is replaced by imports from Alberta. Saskatchewan is not a net exporter; it breaks out even as far as petroleum is concerned, and is an importer as far as natural gas is concerned.

As has been pointed out, this bill gives the Government of Canada the right to set the price, which can be done in one of two ways. One is by agreement by the provinces, and that is the way which will always be sought first. Failing that, the regulating body, the National Energy Board, will have not only the right and duty but the power to set the price if it cannot be set by agreement. To suggest that this power has been exercised in anticipation and that the provinces have been forced to accept a price with respect to which they were not consulted, as was suggested by the honourable senator from Edmonton, Senator Manning, is to trifle with the facts. The price of $6.50 a barrel was reached in negotiation with the producing and the consuming provinces. It was reached as a result of meetings that were held, and the Premier of Alberta went home feeling that he had obtained a good price. Of course, a higher price would have been better, but he was satisfied that in the interests of Canadian unity it was not worthwhile risking a fight over a matter of 50 cents on a barrel of oil.

One point that should be kept in mind is that when the oil-producing countries in the Arabian Gulf set their price for oil at around the $12 mark, they did not do so blindly. It was not as arbitrary a figure, as it might appear. We tend to ask, "How did they decide on that amount of $12?" The fact of the matter is that the OPEC countries estimated that European consumers in 1967 paid a weighted average price of about $10.74 per barrel on composite products, and they found the breakdown of that to be: cost of production, 28.5 cents a barrel; cost of refining, 35 cents; tanker freight, 68 cents; storage, handling, distribution, and dealer's margin, $2.79; oil company net profits, 68.1 cents; indirect and turnover oil taxes in consuming countries, $5.10; and the revenue of producing countries, 85.3 cents, making a total of $10.739. They said, "This is what we are now paying at the producing level, so how can the consuming countries object if we say we want to get what they are willing to pay at the present time?" In other words, it was an attempt by those countries to take up the slack in the price which had been taken up by the taxing powers of the consuming nations.

When we say that Alberta is taking a big chunk—which they would hope to take, at least in respect of the $6.50 that goes to the oil wells—we should not forget that when the product goes, as gasoline, into the oil drums of this province, on the 25 to 30 gallons of gasoline out of every barrel of oil we have to pay, in this province, 20 cents—in Quebec it is 23 cents—by way of local taxes. If we multiply that approximately 25 cents by 25, we find that somewhere between $5 and $6 is being taken off consumers in Ontario and Quebec by their own governments, and that is a sum greater than that which the province of Alberta is extracting by way of the royalties it is imposing, and greater than the amount being taken at present by the federal government by way of taxation on exported oil.

Had the federal government not moved into the field of price setting and influenced the price to Canadian consumers by setting an export price in a quick move when these prices suddenly appeared on the horizon—I am speaking of that $5 or $10 which is going into the federal treasury to help pay the cost of subsidizing the oil that is being imported for the use of consumers in Eastern Canada—the price across the country would have gone up and we would be paying, for all the oil products we use, a price considerably greater than the price we pay now. It is a price, I suggest, sufficient to take up the amounts collected in local taxes by the provincial governments of the consuming provinces. At the same time, it would have allowed the large international oil companies to make a "rip off" profit of $5 a barrel. Instead, that $5 now goes to keeping prices equitable right across the country.

You can call this "political price fixing" if you want. Senator Manning has suggested that there was something bad about that. One thing that makes it difficult for me to follow his argument, and has for years, is that there seems to be a singular lack of consistency in his thinking on public problems.

For example, the producers of oil in Alberta have been able to sell their oil only to the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, which carries all of the oil produced in Alberta to customers in the East, or to the Trans Mountain Pipe Line Company, which takes it to Vancouver and from there into the United States. The price of oil is fixed by somebody. I do not know where the competition he talks about is going to come from. Every month estimates are given to the Alberta Conservation Board of the amount of oil that will be required in the next calendar month, and the board then feeds that information back to the oil fields. The result is that the amount of oil produced in the following month will be enough to precisely meet the demand.

How can you say how much oil you will have a market for unless you have settled on the price you are going to pay for it? Over all these years, the Alberta Energy Board has provided the major oil-producing companies with a price-setting mechanism which has left them free to set the price—in this country and elsewhere—at which Alberta crude is being sold in a manner which, had they tried to do it without the intervention of that government authority, would have left them open to prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act.

How the person who made that possible, having worked out that kind of deal with the oil companies, can express shock at the prospect of the Government of Canada accepting the responsibility of seeing that prices are set at a level which will not hurt the consumers of this country, and give the producers as good a deal as is reasonably possible, I am unable to understand.

The fact also remains that in the years following the beginning of the depression, the discovery of oil in Texas opened up a great many fields. There was complete and unfettered competition. As a result, I think the price of oil went down to as low as 10 cents a barrel. They just drilled wells all over the place, and spilled the oil out into the fields. The amount of waste that took place is beyond description. Finally, in order to protect the interests of future generations in that oil, the American government stepped in and put a clamp on it. It set up the FPC, and put controls on production. By so doing, it effectively set prices for crude oil in the United States.

In the 1950s, the Government of the United States imposed an import tax on oil coming into the United States. It set the tax on imported crude at $1.25 a barrel in order to keep the domestic price up and ensure that the domestic price would encourage the development of further supplies of oil and thus assure the United States of a secure supply. That certainly amounted to price fixing by the American government, and it was done for purposes of national security for which that government was responsible. No one called that political price fixing in the nasty sense in which that phrase was used in this house the other day.

In the international field some interesting things have happened. Everyone seems to want to blame the oil-producing states for the sudden jump in the world price of oil—and, of course, they certainly had something to do with it. However, whether they were the villains that they are made out to be and were actually responsible for their actions—as it appears they might be—or whether they were the dupes of the large oil companies and the American State Department who, for their own purposes, wanted a higher domestic price to ensure their own supplies, is something we perhaps might give some thought to. It is also strange that the price we finished up with, after the mechanisms for pricing had been diddled with, is certainly the price that has been mentioned by the oil companies for some time as the price they must have if they are to replace, from current discoveries, the oil we consume on a day-by-day basis; the oil which we consume in excess of our capacity to produce. In other words, we still have oil that we can sell at a profit. If we sold it at $2.50 a barrel we would be all right, because that is what it costs us to find it and bring the wells into production. However, if we are to replace the barrel of oil we burned yesterday with discovery made this year, then that discovery is going to be in an area where the cost of production will run somewhere between $12 and $15, and even up to $20, a barrel.

That this should happen just at a time when the major oil companies are being denied further access to the cheap supplies of oil in the Middle East, because those countries finally became aware of the wealth they are sitting on and decided to put their own price on their oil is something, I suggest, that should be given very careful consideration. I am not sure that the oil companies are setting the prices for their own benefit, but they are perhaps playing a tune that was worked out in combination with the American State Department.

In case you think I am whistling Dixie or do not know what I am talking about, I should like to read from page 183 of a book entitled The Pricing of Crude Oil, by Taki Rifaï. In case you think the author is just a friend of mine, let me read you his qualifications. These are set out at the back of the book, and are as follows:

Taki Rifaï has worked for over eight years with the Institut Français Du Pétrole (IFP) in various fields that include research, process development and evaluation, industrial economics, feasibility studies, and overall development planning. He has specialized in international petroleum economics with special reference to price structure and pricing policy.

The author was responsible for Middle Eastern affairs in the International Relations Department of the IFP for over five years. He has served occasionally as a UNESCO consultant to a major oil-producing country. He held the position of Economic Advisor to the Libyan Ministry of Petroleum during which time he witnessed the Libyan revolution of September 1, 1969.

Presently, Dr. Rifai is manager at the Banque Arabe et Internationale d'Investissement, a newly created financial institution that is equally subscribed to by Arab and Western interests.

● (1440)

In other words, he is one of the world authorities. This is what he has to say:

The fruitful coexistence of federal strategic objectives and the majors' professional interests before World War II in the U.S. domestic market was a tactical move on both sides because their interests were complementary. On the other hand, their collusion in international action was a strong and durable one since their interests were quite similar. The intimate imbrication of persons and interests between federal authorities and international majors' management is much deeper and far beyond what the average observer could imagine. French readers would better visualize the intricate situation by reading Claude Julien's L'Empire américain. Michel Tanzer has outlined some aspects of the deep-rooted collusion between the federal government and international oil companies outside the United States. Tanzer illustrates this collusion in journalistic style by quoting Washington reporter Jack Anderson in 1967:

The State Department has often taken its policies right out of the executive suites of the oil companies. When Big Oil can't get what it wants in foreign countries, the State Department tries to get it for them. In many countries, the American Embassies function virtually as branch offices for the oil combine... The State Department can be found almost always on the side of the "seven sisters," as the oil giants are known inside the industry.

I could carry on with this. They have the CIA in here too.

The fact of the matter is that every country in the world today recognizes the strategic importance to itself of the price of its energy supplies, and this bill provides the Government of Canada with the machinery by which it can exercise its responsibility in this most important field of endeavour.

The suggestion was made by the former Premier of Alberta, Senator Manning, that this was an unfair discrimination against the producing province of Alberta. Certainly it affects Alberta. It affects British Columbia and Saskatchewan, and it will affect the Northwest Territories. If oil is found off the East Coast, or any other coast of Canada, it will affect those parts of the country as well.

To suggest that oil and petroleum cases can be equated, as the honourable senator suggested, to British Columbia's forest industries or Quebec's pulp operations is again to play loosely with the facts.

Our forest industries and our pulp operations in the various provinces of Canada today are being operated under timber management concessions in place of the old timber berths. I doubt if there is any place, aside from little local cuttings, where major timbering operations are going on, and major forest stands are being depleted, except under licence. The people who are taking the timber out are required to replace it by new plantings. They are harvesting a crop that is continually replacing itself.

That is not the case with our fossil fuels such as oil, natural gas and coal. Once those have gone it will be millions of years, at least, before they are replaced. We will all be long gone before there can be conditions that will permit that replacement to take place.

I think we should also keep in mind today that in our modern society energy plays a part that was not anticipated when the fathers of this nation endeavoured to bring about Confederation. More and more we are becoming dependent upon supplies of energy. Energy has become so important that I submit the time has long since passed when we can allow any part of the supply to be dependent on the whims of individual producers here and there.

I believe that in the search for oil there certainly has been, and probably will continue to be, a place for those people who are prepared to risk their wealth in hope of an adequate return. I think it is in our interests as a people to see that our pricing policies are ranged so that there will be an incentive for those people to continue to look for their pot of oil at the end of their particular rainbow, confident that if they find it they will be able to exchange it for a pot of gold.

Nobody has suggested we should replace any part of the industry. Nobody has suggested that we should replace the refining part of the industry. Let us leave to the technicians the job they have shown us they are able to do. But they have not been able to assure us of the supply we have a right to expect from them; they have not been able to provide us with the security of price we have a right to expect from them. When they cannot undertake that part of the function, it is perfectly proper, I suggest, for the government to step in and accept the responsibility of seeing to it that we have the means to keep warm in the winter, that we have the means to move from one part of the country to another, and that we have the means to keep the wheels of industry turning. We are going to need the fossil fuels a great deal more in the future.

One of the things we are counting on is uranium for our reactors, for our atomic energy plants, and the Government of Canada did not hesitate to step in, even though Ontario companies and workmen were most involved, when it was thought that some of that might slip from our fingers.

I suggest that what the government is doing by this piece of legislation is only what any reasonably prudent government should do in seeing that steps are taken to ensure that the industrial and social life of this country continues in a manner that its inhabitants have enjoyed in the past.

Honourable senators, that concludes the points I wish to place before you this afternoon. If no one else wishes to speak, I have been requested by Senator Hays to move the adjournment of the debate on his behalf.

On motion of Senator Prowse, for Senator Hays, debate adjourned.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-19, to provide for payments in respect of wheat produced and sold in Canada for human consumption in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the request for two-price wheat is a long-standing request in Western Canada. It stemmed originally from the fact—not simply the feeling but the fact—that the products purchased by western grain producers were largely purchased on the protected market, and hence at a higher price, in many instances, than what the world price would be, while the grain that they sold was sold on the international free market. The difference between those two meant that the western grain producers were at a disadvantage. Therefore they were demanding, from basically the Canadian consumers, that there ought to be a higher price for grain consumed within Canada for human consumption, as compared to the price that they obtained on the world market.

For some years the international wheat agreement was effective, and while it did not produce a satisfactory price for the grain producers it nevertheless established some benefits. However, in the late 1960s, as a result of immense surpluses across the world, the international wheat agreement ceased to function. So in 1969 the Government of Canada accepted the proposal of two-price wheat, and in the first instance the price of $1.95½ per bushel, which had been the floor price under the international wheat agreement, was accepted as the price for wheat used in Canada for human consumption. Meanwhile, the world price had dropped to the vicinity of $1.70. That policy continued until January of 1972, when it was evident that the $1.95½ was still not sufficient compared to the cost of other products and to the cost of production.

At that time, therefore, the government agreed to a more realistic price of $3 per bushel, again strictly for wheat used within Canada for human consumption. The policy was that the millers continued to pay the $1.95½ per bushel, and the federal treasury paid the difference of $1.04½, so that the producer had a net price of $3. This carried on for the next year. By the summer of 1973 the whole question of world wheat supply had changed very substantially. World wheat prices began to escalate rapidly, reaching $5 per bushel and more. Meanwhile, in fairness to the producers, their costs were also increasing very substantially. As a result, the government proposed, in September of 1973, a new seven-year program providing for escalation of prices. A bill was introduced at that time in the other place, but before it could reach second reading and be sent to the Senate, the election intervened and the bill died on the Order Paper. This bill, therefore, replaces that original bill and establishes the two-price wheat system on the seven-year basis.

The bill establishes a new basic floor price of $3.25 to be paid by millers for Canadian wheat. This is the limit that the millers pay, and the limit that influenced the price of bread, to the extent that wheat is a factor in the price of bread, leaving aside packaging, labour, and all the rest; but to the extent that wheat is a factor, the price paid by millers is stabilized at $3.25 per bushel.

Based, then, on the world price, the federal treasury provides a subsidy to the producer based on whatever the world price happens to be at the time, up to a maximum of $5 per bushel. For example, if the world price is $4 per bushel, the miller pays $3.25, the federal treasury pays 75 cents, and the producer gets $4, the equivalent of the world price. If, however, the world price goes above $5 per bushel, then the producer is the one who puts in the subsidy, because he gets no more than $5.

The seven-year agreement therefore provides a basic floor price for the producer of grain, and it also provides a very substantial subsidy affecting the price of bread to the consumer. Somewhat the same structure applies for Durum wheat, although the prices are higher.

At this stage the net effect of this proposed plan is to provide a substantial consumer subsidy. It is estimated that if the millers had to pay the current world price for Canadian wheat, the price of a standard 24-ounce loaf of bread would be higher by about five or six cents. Whereas there may have been a slight subsidy for the producer when the government first introduced the floor price in 1969, the situation for the past two or three years has really been one of the federal treasury subsidizing the consumers. In the light of the long-range agreement covering a seven-year period, and the fact that no one can be sure what the price situation is going to be, the producers at this point have indicated they are reasonably satisfied with this arrangement. They have agreed to it with one proviso, that there be an annual review by the minister and the producers, based on changes in the cost of production. This is a factor we cannot ignore, because there is no question—and those in the house who are engaged in farming operations know this only too well—that costs have been escalating, be it land taxes, fuel, fertilizer or machinery. Cost increases have been very substantial. Nevertheless, at this stage there is what amounts to a very substantial consumer subsidy, which in the light of present food costs is a reasonable action for the government to take.

Bread remains one of the basic food elements in this country, and provides a substantial portion of the diet for those on low incomes. I think it is reasonable that this subsidy should be provided, and I commend the bill to honourable senators.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few comments on this measure following the comprehensive introduction by Senator Molgat, giving the history of this legislation and some of its possible effects.

As Senator Molgat said, for many years the farmers of Western Canada asked for a two-price system for wheat. They have felt that the price for domestic wheat should be set on a more independent basis than the international price, and that particularly when international prices are very low the Canadian consumer should not expect to benefit from the full measure of those low prices but should be prepared to pay a more realistic domestic price.

What started out as a two-price system to give the farmer some benefit has turned into the present measure which, to a large extent, is a consumer subsidy. As has been pointed out, from now until July 31, 1980, a floor price for spring wheat is being set at $3.25 a bushel, and the federal government is prepared to pay the difference between $3.25 a bushel and the world price to a maximum of $5.00 a bushel; in other words, it is prepared to pay a subsidy of up to $1.75 a bushel. When the world price is in excess of $5 a bushel, the farmer pays a subsidy because he then foregoes the higher world price. The floor price of Durum wheat, which today is selling at something over $7 a bushel, is $3.25, and the consumer of macaroni wheat, as we call Durum wheat, gets it for $5.75 a bushel, and the federal government pays a subsidy of the amount of the market in excess of that sum of $5 a bushel up to $7.50 a bushel.

Honourable senators, sometimes I wonder why the Liberal Party, of which I am a member, is so clumsy in its introduction and its proposal of measures like this. They seem accident-prone because they take a good question, a good proposition, and they go part way. They do not go quite all the way, and in not having gone quite all the way, in my judgment they have made very few friends with what they have done.

The farm organizations have been quite critical of this legislation, not so much for what has been done immediately but because they feel that to guarantee them a floor price of $3.25 a bushel, with costs going up as fast as they are, until 1980—or, in other words, freezing the floor at $3.25 a bushel until 1980—is not good enough. They feel there should have been in the bill itself, in legislative form, some escalation formula so that farmers would know that if their costs go up this coming year, as they did last year, by 36 per cent, there is going to be some increase in the floor price. The farmers are not going to be any happier with $3.25 fixed as a floor than senators or members of the House of Commons would have been satisfied with a salary that provided for no escalation whatsoever. I think most people would agree that an escalation of 7 per cent in MPs' and senators' salaries is a pretty modest amount. And I suggest to you that 7 per cent per year between now and 1980 amounts to a lot of money, but the farmers did not get a 7 per cent escalation in this formula.

However, after a great deal of pressure, much controversy and the spending of a lot of time, there was an amendment to this bill now before us. That amendment is the addition of subclause (3) to clause 5, which reads as follows:

(3) The Minister shall, on an annual basis and in consultation with the producers, review the provisions of this Act and all related regulations enacted by the Governor in Council with a view to making such recommendations to the Governor in Council as are appropriate in the light of prevailing costs of production of wheat and returns to producers.

Well, we had a "have regard to" clause in a British-Canadian wheat agreement many years ago, and there was great controversy as to what the "have regard to" clause meant. It meant something, but it did not mean all that much in the final analysis. I would have been much happier, both as a producer and as a senator, if there had been a more specific formula than this clause of intention that has been placed in this bill.

Farmers have already paid for this legislation. It is estimated, taking the amount by which the international price to the farmer was loaded, that since this policy has been put into effect it has cost the farmers of Western Canada some $55 million. And I do not think that the farmers would object to paying the $55 million if they saw that in return for having made this contribution to the consumer, the public were prepared to recognize that a floor today may be too low based on increasing costs that will take place within the next few years. I think the farmers and the farm organizations would have given this measure full support, and would have been happy to pay out of their own pockets $55 million towards keeping stabilized bread prices in the country, provided they could feel that the consumer was in fact standing behind them and was prepared to pay something more in future.

I know of no single commodity in Canada, with the exception of flour and bread, where the price is frozen for the consumer. This ingredient will be frozen over the next few years. It seems to me that wheat has been singled out as the one commodity that is really going to be stabilized—flour going into the bread consumed in Canada—and nothing else. The producers of milk get escalation; it is written into the formula. The producers of almost any other commodity are going to get benefits in the future. So wheat producers would have been much happier if there were a specific formula written into this measure.

On November 30 last the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, represented by Mr. Dobson Lea, the vice-president, said, among other things, to the House of Commons Agriculture Committee:

We regard as satisfactory for 1973 the guaranteed base price of $3.25 per bushel for wheat, as provided for in the Canadian Wheat Board regulations dated September 11, 1973 and the consumer subsidy to the maximum of $1.75 per bushel. However, for the current crop year and the following five years, as provided for in the bill, we recommend the bill provide that the guaranteed base price be reviewed and altered annually by the change in the farm inputs price index—

That is, altered by a specific index; when the index goes up, the price must be altered. The bill says that the minister will review it. But then, as I understand it, if there is to be some increase in the price of wheat, there has to be a bill presented to Parliament. The act has to be opened up, and there has to be future parliamentary action. To me this makes it more difficult for the farmers to expect that the floor price will in fact be increased.

The National Farmers Union, represented by Roy Atkinson, the president, had this to say:

We would submit to this Committee and through this Committee to Parliament that it would be an error to proceed with the legislation with a fixed base price. Therefore, we propose to this Committee and through this Committee to Parliament that connected to the base price ought to be an indexing system or an escalator clause that will reflect the increases or the decreases in farmers' cost of production.

In other words, they are prepared to accept a lower floor price if costs go down.

The Palliser Wheat Growers Association, represented by Mr. Walter Nelson, the president, had this to say before the same committee:

● (1510)

We discussed it at a directors' meeting two weeks ago and I tell you what the representative of the wheat growers came up with, a $4.25 floor. We will take a $5 ceiling knowing that we are taking 80 cents, 90 cents to $1 less than the world price by taking $5, but we feel that the floor is low, a $4.25 floor, and we would like one of two things, either an escalator clause or a periodic review of the agreement during the life of it.

The Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board, through Mr. Fergus Young, chairman, said:

Our concern basically is tying us into a seven-year agreement on the basis of this program. There is nothing in Bill C-19 that allows any input cost in wheat production. I think that it is quite obvious that we all know in this past year there has been a tremendous increase in the input cost of wheat. This is basically one item we would like to see in Bill C-19, some type of clause whereby it would be open to suggestion possibly from our board to allow us to reap some of this input cost of wheat.

I suggest to honourable senators that really all that stands between this bill's being a moderately good bill and an excellent bill is the type of escalator clause that the farm organizations have requested. This floor price of $3.25 per bushel exists because it is contained in the bill. However, if there were an escalator clause on the floor price rather than on the government subsidy then, of course, that escalator clause could be included in this bill without there being any charge on the Treasury. It may be that an escalator clause should cover the whole of the range, rather than simply the floor, but it seems to me that honourable senators should consider this bill to see whether there might be in fact such an escalator clause included in it as the farm organizations have requested.

We should determine whether it is reasonable to say to the consumers of bread in Canada that when the farmers' costs of production increase they should be prepared to pay more for flour, in the same way in which they are prepared to pay more for wages when the wage bill in the production of bread increases. The consumers of Canada should not really expect the wheat producers of this country to accept a floor frozen at $3.25 per bushel until 1980. If such progress could be made, my own personal view is that this would be a much better bill.

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator agree, though, that clause 3 does permit the floor to be increased, as well as the federal subsidy?

Senator Argue: Yes, provided it is brought before Parliament. In other words, the government is saying that it is prepared to review it and may then take legislative action, but there is no formula. Knowing governments and the tremendous workload that is before Parliament, and knowing that there is no indexing and no formula, in my opinion it would be much better to say that this will be changed in accordance with a precise formula rather than merely making reference to consideration. I for one am pleased that that paragraph has been added to the bill and, in my view, it is a better bill than when it was first introduced. But, my goodness, it took months of deliberation and oceans of work to finally produce this rather small and reluctant step forward. In my opinion, it should have gone much further.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

MEXICO

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 1, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Fergusson calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of a delegation of Canadian Parliamentarians to Mexico, 6th to 10th January, 1975.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, during the last two or three years Canada's relations with Mexico have been those of a growing friendship. At the present time the extent of our trade relations with that country are not large in the sense that they are with many other countries. Nevertheless, Mexico is a country of growing importance as far as Canada is concerned. Certainly, as far as tourists are concerned it has a great deal more to offer than many other countries.

It has been my pleasure and privilege to visit Mexico on three occasions. The last time was in September 1974 when, more by good fortune than good management—because of the fact that Senator Fergusson could not be in two places at once and she was in Brussels—I was asked to take her place representing the Government of Canada at the Third Annual Reforma—literally, the opening of a new presidential term—in Mexico. I had an opportunity to visit a good part of that country at that time, and I feel it is a country that Canadians should know more about.

As some of you know, for the last eight years it has been my pleasure and privilege to take groups of Canadian businessmen to visit various parts of the world to develop what I call an outward look. Canadian businessmen are good businessmen, but they have the handicap of living in a country which, by its very size and isolation, does not permit many of them to visit other parts of the world to explore opportunities for expanding trade in both directions. Some years ago the institution with which I have had the pleasure of being associated for 23 years, the Banff School of Advanced Management, recognizing the fact that it is important to Canadian businessmen to get out and see what is happening in other countries and to explore the possibilities for expanding trade, commenced going out on annual trade missions. During the past nine years these missions have taken us to Russia, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Japan, China, Africa, Tanzania and a number of other countries. As a matter of fact, we made a second visit to China two years ago, and plans are under way to organize a third in the spring of 1976. This again is for the reason that we feel it to be vitally important in this day and generation for Canadian businessmen to know at first hand of the opportunities existing for the expansion of trade in both directions between our country and others.

It has been my privilege to be in Mexico on two occasions previous to this year. On each visit I was impressed by the friendliness of the people, particularly toward Canadians, and what seemed to be an almost universal desire to formulate closer relations with Canadian business. Accordingly, I approached the group with which I am associated, the graduates of the Banff School of Advanced Management, which now make up an organization of some 2,600 senior executives in Canada. I suggested that it might be useful for Canadian businessmen to take a first-hand look at the opportunities in Mexico, which would afford an opportunity to meet the people and to see the country itself. Accordingly, 28 Canadian executives visited Mexico this spring for three weeks, and had the opportunity of meeting Mexican government officials, businessmen, educators and travel industry representatives. We had an intensive short course which enabled us to learn something about this fascinating country.

As honourable senators know, Mexico is one of the oldest civilizations on the North American continent. As one travels about the country and sees some of the ruins going back to the fifteenth century, one realizes that to North Americans Mexico is the cradle of Western civilization. Prior to that, the Aztecs had developed one of the most advanced civilizations in the world. It is fascinating to see examples of that very advanced civilization which are under excavation at the present time.

This spring some 28 Canadian businessmen had an opportunity of spending 16 interesting days in that country, meeting government officials in trade and commerce, and officials in banking and chambers of commerce, educators in the universities, and seeing something of the country.

It was a most interesting visit, and the timing was important because honourable senators will recall that last year a delegation from the Canadian Parliament visited Mexico, from which visit there followed a visit to Canada by Mexican parliamentarians.

There has developed between our two countries a very warm and close relationship, a relationship which offers a great deal of benefit to both countries in the future. The Mexicans are a friendly, talented people, who have a particularly warm spot in their hearts for Canadians.

During a three-week period in April we had the opportunity of visiting a large part of Mexico. We visited the larger business centres and saw something of Mexico's industrial development in petroleum, mining, agriculture, and so on. It was a practical and interesting adventure, out of which I hope will come the means of further cooperation between Canadian and Mexican executives, and between the Canadian and Mexican governments. Certainly there exist all the elements for a closer integration of our common interests.

Mexicans in the past have spoken about the difficulties with which they were faced, because it is a country which up until the last 30 years was exceedingly poor. It was very backward in its development, and it embarked on its industrial development later than most countries in this hemisphere. However, it has more than made up for that period of stagnation. Tremendous progress has been made during the past 30 years, with the result that Mexico City today, a city with a population of approximately nine million people, is one of the most attractive on the North American continent. Mexico City is rich in architecture, the arts, and tradition. Its tradition goes back to the age of the conquistadors. Mexico is certainly a country well worth visiting and, as I have already said, Canadians receive a particularly warm welcome.

Through the courtesy of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Mexico, and the Mexican government, and through the courtesy of the Canadian ambassador, Mr. Schwarzmann, and his staff, we had the opportunity of being exposed at first hand to an exchange of ideas and information with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the chambers of commerce in Mexico City. We also spent some time at the universities and had an unusual opportunity of receiving a compact, condensed, short history of Mexico, its development, and its relations with other countries, particularly Canada.

Mexico is a country rich in diversity. Agriculture is a major industry. The cattle industry in particular is one of the main arms of its productivity. Agriculture, literally, has gone from the horse and buggy days into the modern agricultural era in a period of 30 years. Probably in no area of the North American continent have the changes been so dramatic in such a short period of time.

While Mexico has a long way to go to reach the efficiency in agriculture that exists in Western Canada, it is nevertheless making rapid progress. The country is utilizing modern equipment, cropping techniques, fertilizers, irrigation, and so on, and its productivity has increased phenomenally.

In the urban centres the country has had to face problems similar to those which exist in other urban areas, and possibly to an even greater extent, because housing in some of the larger cities until recently left a great deal to be desired. Tremendous housing programs have been developed in the last few years and, generally speaking, there has been a spectacular upgrading of the standard of living.

Coupled with the increase in the quality of life has come a new confidence and buoyancy, and one has the feeling, when talking to businessmen, and those in education and the arts, that here is a country which has discovered itself. Mexico is able to draw upon a rich tradition going back longer than any other part of this continent. Education is high on the list of priorities. Mexican universities are first class, and are turning out the engineers, doctors and lawyers, et cetera, so essential to the maintenance of a high quality of life in any country.

As I have mentioned, Mexico is a country of great diversity. It is a tourists' paradise. There are high mountains, such as we have in Western Canada, and there are famous seaside resorts, such as Acapulco, Puerto Vallarta, and others, which leave nothing to be desired in the way of modern conveniences and comforts. They provide a pleasant atmosphere in which to spend some time. I suspect that through the efforts of CP Air, as well as Air Canada, which have a fine and convenient air service from Calgary, Vancouver and Toronto to Mexico City, we shall find more Canadians visiting Mexico every year.

In that part of the country from which I come, it has been traditional for people to visit California, Washington, Oregon, and Arizona. However, an increasing number of people are expanding their horizons and travelling beyond the United States into Mexico. There is an advantage in doing so, because the American civilization, standard of living and mores are so similar to our own, and one experiences little change in travelling from Canada to the United States. But when one travels from Canada to Mexico, one is exposed to a very different type of civilization. It is a much older society than ours. You see aspects of it that are enriching, such as the ancient ruins of the Aztecs, and the ruins of buildings built in a more recent time, right up to the late 1850s.

Mexico has made great progress. Since 1910, coinciding with the end of the revolutionary period, that country has really gone ahead. Honourable senators will no doubt recall that from the 1880s until 1910, Mexico was a country of very unstable governments. There were many revolutionary leaders. As a matter of fact, I recall when I was a youngster of 10 or 12 reading about a famous character named Emeliano Zapata. Zapata was a bandit who came out of the hills and swept everything before him. There was also, of course, Pancho Villa, one of the most colourful characters to come on the national scene of any country. The period between 1880 and 1910 was a troubled time in Mexico, but from 1910 on there has been stable government. As a result of continuity and stability, successive Mexican governments have been able to organize the life of the country, and dramatic progress has been made in the last 60 years.

Mexico City has a population of nine million. It is a very modern city, but you will still find the old adobe shacks in the outlying parts. In the city proper, there is Avenue Reforma, one of the great avenues of the world. They compare it to the Champs Elysées in Paris. It is a very fine avenue, and the Reforma statue standing at the top of it is one of the great landmarks in Mexico City. It is a dramatic monument to the liberation of that country, and the beginning of the period of stability following the revolution.

In the last 50 years, as a result of coming into a period of tranquillity, security and stability, progressive Mexican governments have been able to concentrate their efforts on educating and training the people, and in laying the industrial base for a great civilization.

The population of Mexico today is 56 million, and it is expected by the end of the century to reach 125 million. It is going to be a big power. They are concerned with plans for the absorption into the economy of the people who are going to live in that country in the period between now and the end of the century.

I think it is fair to say that the Mexicans have been rather imaginative in their approach to laying the foundation for an advanced technological society, an advanced culture. It is a country which, I think, is very rich. Canada could benefit greatly by capitalizing on the friendship between the two countries and in cultivating stronger relations. I should like to see the number of exchanges involving parliamentary delegations between Canada and Mexico increase, as well as exchanges between businessmen of both countries, right down to the ordinary citizens.

Mining has long been known as one of Mexico's most productive industries, particularly silver mining which occupies an important role in the national economy. Agriculture, of course, is one of the basic and major industries of Mexico, and they have been developing breeds and quality of cattle that offer a good deal to Canada. They have been concerned with developing not only breeds that utilize feed effectively and economically, but animals that are relatively resistant to disease and to the various ticks and bugs that can inhibit the production of either milk or beef from those animals.

Altogether, Mexico is a country that is on the march. It is utilizing modern technology to its fullest extent. The Extension workers in the field work closely with the farmers, and they have adopted the latest in modern irrigation engineering. I might say, it is a country that has a great deal to offer in the irrigation field. In fact, irrigation is an essential element in agricultural productivity in that country.

Mexico is a country that has a great deal to offer, and I think it is important that Canada continue to cultivate good relations with it. I should like to see a larger exchange of parliamentarians between Mexico and Canada than has taken place up to the present time. I should also like to see a larger exchange between Mexican and Canadian businessmen. I am satisfied that to many Canadian businessmen, Mexico is a country that means very little. That is not the case. It is a country of expanding markets. The projected population increase from 56 million today to 125 million by the end of the century is a good indication of that.

Mexico is a country that is well disposed towards Canada, and I hope we will be able to expand our contacts with it. The opportunities for trade between Canada and Mexico are increasing. There are many products which we grow that cannot be grown in Mexico, and vice versa.

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to take up much of your time in discussing this subject today. However, I think it is important to emphasize that Mexico is a country which has a great deal to offer Canada. It is rich in experience, rich in opportunities, rich in its heritage. I should like to see a much more aggressive policy on the part of our tourist industry in arranging for more Canadians to spend time in Mexico, particularly in the winter when they enjoy a very pleasant climate. It is not much farther to Mexico than it is to California or Florida. In addition to the warm climate you have the added advantage of going to a completely different civilization, an ancient civilization, and a country that is rich in its heritage, in the arts, in literature, in music, and so forth. I am sure Canadians would benefit greatly from the cultivation of a greater knowledge of that country.

I hope that the Canadian Parliament will arrange for more exchanges with the Mexican Parliament; I hope that Canadian chambers of commerce will arrange for more exchanges than have taken place in the past between Canadian and Mexican businessmen; and I particularly hope that the ordinary Canadian citizen will take advantage of the opportunities that are offered by the various tour packages under which they can visit that country. It is not an expensive trip. You can go to Mexico and spend some time there for less than it costs to go from Western Canada to Europe. It is the one country in the northern hemisphere that offers a completely different background in civilization, history, language and literature, and a visit is very well worthwhile.

I should like to see the Parliament of Canada, at the earliest opportunity, arrange for an invitation to Mexican parliamentarians to visit Canada. It is true that we have had some visits, but they were of relatively small groups. I should like many more to come, and arrangements made whereby Canadian parliamentarians could have an opportunity to go to Mexico, explore the country and get to know the people.

In addition to visits by parliamentarians I think it is important that businessmen, through chambers of commerce and other business organizations, go out of their way to explore the opportunities that lie literally on our doorstep on this continent—opportunities that offer a market for some of our products which Mexico cannot produce, and opportunities for them to supply us with goods that we cannot produce.

Honourable senators, I thought I would take these few moments to tell you of our experiences in Mexico. The Canadian businessmen, from Ontario to British Columbia, who went to Mexico for three weeks in April of this year all want to go again. They all returned with a new feeling for, and a new appreciation of, our neighbour one country removed on the North American continent.

A visit to Mexico is a different experience from one to the United States. It does not cost much more, and you are in a completely different and exciting civilization. I suggest, therefore, that Canada should lose no time in seeking the opportunity to provide the means by which Canadians can spend more time in Mexico. Particularly, we should find means of inviting the Mexicans to spend more time in Canada, because to the majority of them this is the great land of wide open spaces, the land of the frozen north, and it is high time that this ancient idea was completely dispelled. We would be mutual benefactors if there were a greater exchange between our peoples.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 20, at 8 p.m.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES (INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS) ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN TEXTILE PROBLEMS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 13 last Senator Cameron asked the following question:

Could the Leader of the Government give us some idea of the dollar value of the suits or suiting materials brought in from Taiwan and/or Hong Kong in a year?

The answer, which consists of statistical detail, is as follows:

Suits—all types (men's, women's, children's)—not necessarily fine, unstructured (a term used for casual):

Hong Kong—Fine and Sport (except knitted) $1.3 million

Taiwan $281,000

(Total Canadian Import $8,212,000, including figures for Hong Kong and Taiwan).

Suits made of knitted fabric:

Hong Kong $1,082,000

Taiwan $604,000

This makes a total import for suits of all types, including knits, as follows:

Taiwan $885,000

It is not possible for me to quote exact figures for materials imported for suiting purposes as materials may be directed to end users and made up into a number of clothing articles such as skirts, slacks, jackets, dresses, coats, et cetera.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 15, the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hays speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, in his remarks the other day Senator Manning pointed out that Bill C-32 is one of the most important bills to have come before Parliament in a long time. That is so because the bill deals with something upon which we are all dependent: energy in all of its many forms.

I am not going to reply to the contributions made in the Senate, because this has been ably done by the Leader in the Senate, by Senator Manning, by Senator Grosart, and also by my colleague Senator Prowse. All of these have covered the subject very well.

I would, however, just like to leave with you, before moving second reading, the suggestion that the bill go to the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, a few ideas that have occurred to me. The province that I come from, Alberta, supplies a great deal of the conventional oil and conventional gas that is produced from fossil fuels in Canada. This is a depleting industry. The jurisdictions respecting this particular field, as we all know, were left with the provinces, provided that the fuel in question was within the province concerned. I do not want to go into the constitutional problems that have been raised, but I should emphasize that it is only one of the many forms of energy that we have in Alberta and, indeed, all over Canada. One day we will have to take a long look—and probably the Upper House is as good a place as any to initiate such a study—at how we are going to handle all forms of energy that Canada possesses.

If you fly from the Yukon to the 49th parallel, any time between September and July, you will fly over probably the greatest watershed in the world. It is covered with snow that falls on the Rocky Mountains for eight to 10 months a year, and sometimes even for 12 months. When I had the honour of being in Mr. Pearson's Cabinet I think in some way I was responsible for initiating the Saskatchewan-Nelson River basin study of the eastern slopes of the Rockies. It was hoped that the study would eventually benefit all of Canada, not only as to our water resources but also our hydroelectric power. Few Canadians realize the fantastic amount of electricity that can be generated from water running off mountains that are 8,000 or 9,000 feet high, and from the water running right across the Prairies, some of it going into the Arctic and some of it into the Great Lakes. There has always been a question as to the ownership of this water, and the sooner we establish our priorities the better off Canadians are going to be, because none of us can live alone. We have often heard it said that there are no islands, that we are all part of the mainland. I wanted to mention water because it is one of our most important resources. I am sure that our friends to the south would be very happy if all our water could be made to flow south. Studies have been made as to how the rest of Canada would be affected if our water did, indeed, flow south instead of north and east.

We should also think of the great coal fields in this area. No one knows how much coal we have. Some, who claim to know, say that we probably have the greatest coal fields in the world. When Hitler ran out of conventional oil in the last Great War, his scientists were able to produce energy by gasifying coal that was brought up from 4,000 to 5,000 feet below ground, and it took the whole world, with all the technology then available, to defeat him. Such matters make us realize just how important our energy is for the rest of Canada.

I think of many things that I do and am more familiar with in the field of agriculture. When we supply 35 per cent of the meat consumed in Toronto and Montreal, I wonder what I, as a Canadian and an Albertan, would do without that market. Then, looking at the other side of the coin, when I buy a Massey-Harris tractor for $25,000 or $30,000, I wonder what I would do without it, and if we did not have the manufacturers of Eastern Canada. So, we are dependent upon one another.

When my good friend Peter Lougheed, whom I have known for 25 years, and my friend Gerald Regan, whom I travelled with many times when he was in the other place, were making their statements at the first ministers' conference, I think, if the shoes had been on the other feet, that Peter Lougheed would have taken the position Gerald Regan took, and Gerald Regan would have taken the position Peter Lougheed took. So the question really is this: Is it "Canada first", or is it "me first"? These are the things we have to be truly big about, because if we are not then we are indeed all going to be the losers.

A study of history tells us that all wars have been caused by boundary lines. I cannot but think that if Canadians today were asked to sit down and draw the boundaries of the provinces, they would not draw them as they were drawn in the past. They would probably have the Prairie provinces together from the 49th parallel to the Arctic, Ontario and Quebec together, and the Maritimes united. Sir John Ormond told me in New Zealand a long time ago, "You will never have all your problems in Canada resolved until you do what we did in the late 1890s, and that is do away with the boundary lines."

Honourable senators, these are some of our great problems. Bill C-32 is a bill that I hope will not have to be used, and that instead the provinces can get together to resolve these problems that so greatly affect all Canadians. This is a good bill, and I commend it to you because I think it can be used as a means to make things better for all Canadians—that is, if it has to be used, but I hope that will not happen.

If this bill receives second reading, then I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I know that honourable senators have many questions that cannot be answered here, and in committee the officials will make themselves available to answer such questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Hays, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Harry Hays moved the second reading of Bill S-24, to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I apologize for being on my feet twice in one evening.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hays: Bill S-24, an act to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada, is a short bill, but one about which the petitioners feel keenly. I can probably explain it best by referring to one of their brochures.

In summary, the proposal is to form a new Canadian chartered bank, which will become a specialized, business-oriented bank throughout Canada and internationally. It is hoped that the name of the bank, as I mentioned, will be the National Commercial Bank of Canada. The authorized capital will be $40 million—four million shares at a par value of $10—of which $22 million, or two million shares at an issue price of $11, has been subscribed. Of the first issue, $2 million will be a contribution to the bank's rest account. Canadian institutions, primarily pension plans, will be offered the main opportunity to participate. The head office will be in Vancouver, British Columbia.

The proposed new bank will be a "wholesale" bank, and will need branches in only the main commercial centres of each Canadian region. These branches will be low in overhead, and their management teams will consist of a small number of competent persons who are specialists in the commercial interest of their region.

They will specialize their lending in higher yielding business loans, resource financing, real estate financing, term loans, loans to small businesses, and the like. The risk that is sometimes associated with these assets will be minimized by close, specialized management and forms of insurance, such as mortgage insurance.

The new bank will offer commercially-oriented services, including financial counselling. It will decentralize management responsibilities; it will be innovative and will participate in the development of new ventures, including those involving new Canadian technology. It will seek "wholesale" deposits, primarily term. It will, in effect, be buying money in the principal money markets.

The sponsor of the National Commercial Bank of Canada is Boyd, Stott & McDonald Limited. A short look at Boyd, Stott & McDonald and their background may explain why they feel they possess the qualifications to sponsor a new chartered bank. I shall give honourable senators a rundown of the six provisional directors of the bank.

● (2020)

In 1960, Bill McDonald was with the Bank of Nova Scotia. He developed that bank's mortgage portfolio. Michael Boyd was with Greenshields Incorporated, working in the area of corporate development. Together with their colleagues, their joint efforts on behalf of their corporations resulted in the formation of several financial intermediaries.

The Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada, MICC, was incorporated by special act of Parliament in 1963 to insure first mortgages that were of greater ratio, relative to the value of a residential property, than was at that time allowed as an investment under the life insurance, trust and loans companies acts.

Central Covenants Limited was incorporated to hold that part of the first mortgages insured by the MICC that was above the allowable limit. The combined effect of these companies was to replace expensive second mortgages by higher ratio first mortgages, allowing Canadians to save money on the cost of financing their homes and creating a vehicle whereby the traditional Canadian mortgage institutions could take advantage of a higher ratio mortgage market without increased risk.

The value of these institutions was shown by a gradual raising of the allowable ratio ceiling on mortgages by the federal government. Central Covenants Limited, because of this lifting of the ratio restrictions, became redundant to its original purpose and developed into a regular mortgage company with assets today of some $75 million. MICC continued to play a highly significant role in the Canadian mortgage market. It wrote $2 billion worth of private mortgage insurance in 1974.

Another company established in much the same way was Home Capital Funds Incorporated, an American company. I shall not dwell on that. In 1964, the company, which was eventually to become BSM, was incorporated. Since that time BSM has created several new financial intermediaries, some for its own account and some for others. Morguard Trust Company, in which it has an 80 per cent interest, is a principal force in the mortgage banking field. It was begun in 1966, and now has over $600 million potential portfolio of mortgages under administration.

From that it will be seen that the directors or principals of the proposed new bank are responsible people. We should give serious consideration to passing Bill S-24 to start this new bank. There will be six provisional directors, all of whom are outstanding Canadians.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading I intend to move that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Senator Heath: Is there any provision for a restriction on the percentage of shares that can be owned or controlled by individual, corporate or government shareholders?

Senator Hays: This will be a private bank, and its innovators would like to see, as principal shareholders, Canadian institutions, primarily pension plans. There may be 25 such institutions, each holding 4 per cent of the shares. There are laws to ensure percentage of holdings.

That is the general makeup of the bank. It is a wholesale bank, and it will be a private bank.

Senator Molson: When my honourable friend says it will be a "wholesale" bank, does he mean there will be no phase of its activities that deals with the ordinary, small individual; that there will be no banking for the ordinary, small operator or depositor? I am not quite clear about the term "wholesale" in this case.

Senator Hays: It will be involved in deposits and loans, but it will not have branches all over the country or be staffed in the same way as our chartered banks. It would participate in lending money to small businesses; it would also be involved in mortgages, and so forth. It might even be a "walk-up," only more substantial, than the suitcase banks we have in Canada today.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): What is a "suitcase bank?"

Senator Hays: Well, a person who does his banking out of a suitcase. He makes loans and accepts deposits out of a suitcase. There are many in that field in Canada today.

Senator Bourget: Do you supply the suitcase, too?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Molson: Or postponement?

Senator Grosart: Adjournment. New rules.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 20, the debate on the motion of Senator Robichaud for second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, it has been some time since we have debated the motion of Senator Robichaud for second reading of Bill S-21. Apart from the fact that there has been other urgent and prior business which has occupied this chamber, I felt that the contents of Bill S-21 were of such importance that I wanted to take some time to review the various factors and problems that the bill itself raises. Hopefully, I will have a few well-educated comments which may be of some help to us in that regard.

I might say that I have tried to atone for the delay I have caused in continuing the debate on the motion for second reading by preparing an inordinately long speech, and I hope honourable senators will bear with me.

As honourable senators will recall, Bill S-21 provoked a good deal of discussion about capital punishment. My views on that subject are on record. I do not propose to speak to that particular matter this evening, particularly since we also have Bill S-23 before us. I would prefer simply to confine my remarks to Bill S-21 itself.

I have carefully read and re-read the speech made by Senator Robichaud in moving second reading of Bill S-21, as well as the speeches of those who have preceded me in this debate. There is obviously some confusion and indecision among us as to what Senator Robichaud seeks to do, and what in fact this bill could accomplish.

If Senator Robichaud's purpose is to obtain the approval of the Senate to restrict the royal prerogative, and any other power that rests with the government to commute the sentence of death, I believe he cannot succeed, either on procedural or constitutional grounds. I would go even further, and say that I believe the majority of honourable senators, regardless of the views they hold on capital punishment, could not support the principle of curtailing the royal prerogative of mercy. I stress the "principle" of that ancient right; not the practice of administering it, which many people are questioning today.

If, on the other hand, Senator Robichaud's primary desire is to focus attention and to provoke discussion on the legitimate worries of our citizens regarding the rising tide of crime and violence in our country, and the underlying questions as to whether we as a government are doing our best to stem it and turn it back, to punish appropriately those who threaten us and to support those who are selected to protect us, then he has succeeded very well indeed.

● (2030)

Because the prerogative of mercy is of prime interest today and is being hotly debated by many people who may not understand its historic origins or its application, I should like to read into the record one of the clearest descriptions of this power that I have found. It is contained in a report of a "Committee appointed to Inquire into the Principles and Procedures followed in the Remission Service of the Department of Justice of Canada." This report was prepared at the request of the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Stuart S. Garson. The distinguished members of the committee that prepared this report were headed by Mr. Justice Gerald Fauteux. I quote the opening paragraphs of chapter IV:

The prerogative powers consist of all the special dignities, liberties, privileges, powers and royalties allowed by the common law to the Crown, which have not been taken away by statute. One of the important prerogatives that remains vested in Her Majesty in right of Canada is the royal prerogative of mercy. Under it a pardon may be granted to any person convicted of a criminal offence or the punishment imposed by the court in respect of the offence may be commuted or remitted.

In Canada the power is exercised by the Governor General on behalf of the Queen. The Letters Patent that constitute the office of Governor General of Canada direct, in effect, that the Governor General shall not exercise the royal prerogative of mercy without first receiving the advice of the Privy Council for Canada in capital cases, and at least one of his Ministers in other cases.

In addition to this all-embracing prerogative power, there are several Acts of Parliament that authorize the granting of similar relief to offenders.

I quote from the next paragraph:

The wider power conferred upon the Governor General by the Letters Patent is not affected by the narrower statutory powers. In the result, this combination of prerogative and statutory powers provides a useful flexibility which assures that, ultimately at least, relief can be granted in all deserving cases. Such a combination of sources of relief existing under the British system of government is also to be found in other countries.

Senator Connolly was quite correct in stating that there are twin sources of this power. There is the ancient right of the Crown to bestow mercy, older than Parliament itself, which was transferred absolutely to the Governor General by letters patent in 1947. In addition, the Government of Canada has had the statutory power to commute sentences, including sentences of death, since Confederation. I have here a photocopy of chapter 29 of the Statutes of Canada, 32-33 Victoria, 1869, in which the provisions are contained for statutory commutation of sentences. I may say that there is the further provision in the statute of 1869, section 129, which reads:

Nothing in this Act shall or doth in any manner limit or affect Her Majesty's Royal prerogative of mercy.

So at least since Confederation we have had these two sources of commutation.

Incidentally, I might go even further than Senator Connolly. I know of no occasion since Confederation when the royal prerogative of mercy, as distinct from the statutory power, was exercised. However, I really did not do a thorough research on that point, and I could be wrong.

To return to Bill S-21, Senator Robichaud has stated that what he is trying to accomplish by amending section 684(1) of the Criminal Code is to restrict the right of the Governor in Council to commute a sentence of death unless certain conditions are met. This is substantially what Bill S-21 proposes, and, if passed, could only achieve—that is, a limitation upon the statutory right of commutation.

On the other hand, the opening phrase of the suggested amendment to section 684(1) is:

Notwithstanding anything in this Act or in any other law or prerogative—

That appears to indicate an attempt to affect the royal prerogative. Moreover, although Senator Robichaud stated that the purpose of the bill is to remove from the Governor in Council the authority to exercise clemency—and this is confirmed in the explanatory note accompanying the bill—he referred a couple of times during the course of his speech to the royal prerogative. His closing remarks contained this observation:

I want it to be crystal clear that I believe in the royal prerogative, provided it is exercised on a recommendation from the trial judge or the jury for clemency, or when a jury cannot agree on a recommendation for clemency.

Since those are the conditions set out in Bill S-21, it seems apparent that the proposed legislation is meant to abridge both the royal prerogative of mercy and the statutory power of clemency. That inference was obviously drawn by subsequent speakers in the debate, and I recall an exchange between Senator Grosart and Senator Asselin during the course of Senator Connolly's speech. That is reinforced by the fact that the sponsor of the bill has not sought to correct this misapprehension, if in fact it is one.

This, then, leaves us with a dilemma. If we consider Bill S-21 as introduced, ignoring for a moment the implications of that word "prerogative" in the opening sentence, we must accept the fact that it would only partially amend or affect a particular provision in our law. If we assume that it was intended also to abridge the royal prerogative, then the sponsor is faced with almost insurmountable procedural and constitutional difficulties. Several honourable senators are obviously aware that they exist, and Senator Bélisle in particular mentioned them in some detail.

I do not want to repeat all that is now on record regarding Bill S-21 but, on the assumption that it was intended to affect the royal prerogative of mercy, I should like to state briefly what I see to be its principal and even fatal defects.

Royal prerogatives may be limited, held in abeyance or abrogated by act of Parliament. An old rule of the common law holds that the rights and prerogatives of the Crown could only be changed or repealed by the express and clear terms of a statute. That rule was codified in our Interpretation Act and upheld in an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords in Re Silver Brothers Limited, (1932) Appeal Cases, page 514. That case held that, by virtue of section 16 of the Interpretation Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, some such general declaration as "notwithstanding anything in this or any law or statute," which was intended to affect the rights of the Crown, is not itself sufficient unless it is also expressly stated in the provision that the Crown is to be bound thereby. That, of course, is the general phraseology of the first paragraph of Bill S-21, and that, according to the highest judicial authority, in itself could vitiate the legislation.

[Senator Neiman.]

There is an added interesting complication. The Privy Council decision was based on section 16 of our Interpretation Act of 1906, which read:

No provision or enactment in any act shall affect, in any manner whatsoever, the rights of His Majesty, his heirs or successors, unless it is expressly stated therein that His Majesty shall be bound thereby.

● (2040)

That language is strong and precise. It makes it apparent why the House of Lords came to the decision it did.

The present version of the provision is not nearly so clear. Section 16 of the Interpretation Act today states:

No enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner, except only as therein mentioned or referred to.

The section now appears to be quite a bit more general—vague, if you wish—than the previous section. I understand that in England it has been held that, if an act does not expressly abolish a prerogative but simply covers the sphere of the prerogative, then the said prerogative is in abeyance so long as the statute remains in force. That, possibly, could happen with this particular bill. I do not know if that judicial decision, which I assume it to be, has been recognized by Canadian courts, but it is obvious that the effect of the wording of Bill S-21 would require some careful legal interpretation.

As I have mentioned, there has been an explicit provision in our criminal law, at least as far back as the Statutes of Victoria, 1869, that nothing in the act governing that law shall limit or affect Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy. That provision is now contained in section 686 of the Criminal Code. As several honourable senators have pointed out, Bill S-21 does not allude to or attempt to repeal it. It therefore remains in full force and effect. If this bill were effectively to abrogate the royal prerogative of mercy, it might be sufficient for it simply to state that "section 686 is hereby repealed," or, in accordance with the Privy Council decision made on section 16, it might have to go further and state as well that "the royal prerogative of mercy is limited in its application to the same conditions laid down for the statutory powers of commutation in the proposed amendment to section 684(1).

It is my opinion that the defects I have mentioned are of such a serious kind that they affect the fundamental nature of the bill itself and so could not be cured by amendments either here or in committee. However, even if I am wrong, Bill S-21, as of now, lacks an essential element: the consent of the Crown.

I refer you to Erskine May's Treatise on the Laws, Privileges, Proceedings and Usages of Parliament, Seventeenth Edition, 1964. What I am about to read is found at page 8. It is from the description of the constituent parts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom:

The Crown of these realms is hereditary, being subject, however, to special limitations by Parliament; and the King or Queen has ever enjoyed, by prescription, custom and law, the chief place in Parliament and the sole executive power. The right of succession and the prerogatives of the Crown itself are, however, subject to limitations and change by legislative process with the consent and authority of the sovereign.

While studying this bill, I was referred to the debates in the other place when an historical amendment to the Petition of Right Act was introduced by the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Stuart Garson, in 1951. That bill sought to abrogate an age-old prerogative of the Crown by abolishing the necessity of the subject's obtaining a Governor General's fiat; that is, his permission, before taking proceedings against the Crown. Having studied the original act and amendment during my days in law school, I found it a fascinating exercise to read the actual record in Hansard of that significant milestone in Canada's constitutional history.

When the Minister of Justice moved second reading of the Petition of Right Act without having indicated that he had obtained the Queen's consent to the bill, that stalwart defender of the Crown and of our Constitution, the right honourable member from Prince Albert, then of Lake Centre, promptly brought him to task. He said:

Before dealing in general with this bill I would say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that I have some doubts as to whether his manner of introducing this bill will give legality to the bill when it becomes law. As the minister has stated, since the days of Edward I the king has been in the position of superiority in so far as his relations with his subjects are concerned.

And he went on to say that he felt that if this consent was not given, he very much doubted whether the bill could be considered legal.

The right honourable member then illustrated his point by recalling similar legislation which was introduced a few years previously in the United Kingdom. Interestingly enough, that government bill was first introduced in the House of Lords where the Lord Chancellor used these words:

In moving the second reading of the bill, I have it in command to acquaint the house that His Majesty the King, having been informed of the contents of the Crown Proceedings Bill, is prepared to place the interests of the Crown at the disposal of Parliament in connection with the bill.

Later, when the bill went to the House of Commons, the Attorney General in moving second reading used almost the identical language to indicate again that the consent of the Queen had been obtained. That would appear to refute Senator Bélisle's supposition that a bill requiring the Queen's consent can only be introduced in the House of Commons. It would appear obvious from the precedent we have here that it would be quite in order to introduce such a bill in the Senate, provided the requisite consent was obtained and so declared.

In the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the Petition of Right Act the Minister of Justice pointed out that, because the introduction of the bill had been forecast in the previous Speech from the Throne, the only requisite was to indicate some time before third reading that the Queen's consent to the measure had been obtained. That was done. It is significant to note that on subsequent measures of a similar kind—for instance, the Crown Liability Act of 1952—the Minister of Justice made an oral statement of the Queen's consent before the bill was introduced for first reading.

At this point I am not at all certain that a member can effectively sponsor a private bill which would in any way affect the royal prerogative. Even if he could do so, it is obvious that he would first have to arrange through the government leader to obtain the Queen's consent to the proposed measure. Since I am certain that this government would not in any case approve of the principle of abrogating the royal prerogative of mercy, I cannot believe that the government leader in the Senate would recommend to his colleagues in Privy Council that such a proposal be considered.

If the introducer of a bill finds, from statements of a minister, that the royal assent will be withheld, he has no other alternative open to him except to withdraw the measure.

I do not know if the sponsor of this bill has tried to determine whether he could obtain that consent of Parliament, but in any case I very much doubt that he would get it.

Perhaps I should make one more observation. If we were to consider Bill S-21 on the basis that it purports to limit only the statutory power of commutation, then I have a feeling that it should contain some reference to and possibly an amendment of section 670 of the Criminal Code, because that is the section which sets out how a trial judge will determine and record whether or not the individual members of a jury are prepared to make a recommendation, either for or against mercy. Since I do not believe that any of us are really considering the bill on that basis, we probably do not have to pursue that particular line of inquiry any further.

As to the principle which underlies Bill S-21, that is that the royal prerogative of mercy or the statutory power to commute a sentence of death should in any way be limited, I am totally opposed to it. Several honourable senators before me have expressed their objections and their opposition to that concept far more eloquently than I can. I can only echo and support the views they have expressed.

On the other hand, there are obviously many people who, regardless of their views on capital punishment, have great misgivings about the government's exercise of clemency. Some have gone so far as to say that there has been a flouting of the will of Parliament in the exercise of that power. I simply cannot accept that view.

I would remind honourable senators again that the government's right to commute a sentence of death, as well as the ancient prerogative of mercy, have been part of the statute law of Canada at least since we became a nation. They reflect the will of Parliament as much as any other federal statute or enactment, including those which empower the government to direct that a person shall be sentenced to death for certain offences. To be required to exercise any of those powers is the type of awesome responsibility that I am thankful I do not have to accept.

Because the issue of commutation is very much in our minds these days, I think it would be as well to remind ourselves of the painstakingly careful procedure which must be followed before each member of the cabinet decides whether or not to recommend to the Governor General that mercy be granted. It should be remembered that the trial judge is required by law to pronounce the sentence of death against a person who has been convicted of a capital offence for which the penalty is prescribed. On the other hand, no application for the mercy of the Crown is required. Every capital case is automatically considered by the cabinet.

As soon as possible after a sentence of death has been pronounced, the trial judge is required to make a report to the ministry of the Solicitor General. It is a detailed summary of the important features of the case. It reviews the evidence which has been adduced for the prosecution and the defence, and it comments on any questions of law that may have arisen. Where there is conflicting evidence, the judge may be invited by the cabinet to express his opinion as to the weight to be given to the evidence. The report, of course, would include a summary, in accordance with section 670 of the Criminal Code, of the recommendations either for or against clemency, and of those who chose to make no recommendation.

Even before all avenues of appeal have been exhausted, the Solicitor General will endeavour to get permission from defence counsel to have the convicted person examined by two independently appointed psychiatrists. If this is granted, their reports, along with any previous psychiatric reports, the transcripts of evidence and the exhibits at trial, all appeal books, police reports from any police forces involved in the investigation of the case, petitions or letters from friends or relatives, representations from defence counsel—all these and any other material that may have any possible bearing on the case are assembled and given to each member of the cabinet for study and consideration. Each member must then make his own decision on the evidence before him as to whether the convicted person is deserving of mercy.

Each of us here today has his and her set of religious and ethical concepts; our social and moral standards are firmly—perhaps too firmly—embedded in our souls and minds. I can well understand that if each of us were presented with the material that the cabinet must consider on commutation, we very likely would not all agree on what in the final analysis it all meant. Our perception as to what is even a fact is conditioned by the forces within us, by the knowledge we have as well as the knowledge we think we have. But if you were to come to a different decision from mine on what we conceive to be a given set of facts, I would believe that you had done so with as much conscience and responsibility as I hope I had.

Senator Robichaud apparently believes that some of the abuses he sees in our present system would be corrected if it were left to the jury and the judge to decide who should live and who should die. I cannot believe that many of them would want that dreadful responsibility. For as many centuries as our system of justice has allowed juries, their role has been to decide the guilt or innocence of the accused. The judge is required by law to pronounce a sentence of death, but even he knows there is a higher authority which will make the ultimate decision. Section 670 of the Criminal Code requires a trial judge to advise the jury that it is not required to bring in a recommendation for or against clemency. If it does, of course, it would be a unanimous recommendation. If it does not, the judge polls the jurors individually, but some of them may still exercise their right to refuse to make a recommendation. The reasons why they would choose the latter course are their own. We can only speculate, but two of the most obvious might be that a juror retains some misgivings in his own mind as to whether a correct verdict has in fact been reached, or feels strongly that it is not any part of his responsibility to decide on whether or not a man should die.

I have before me a list of all the men who have been sentenced to death since section 670 was enacted into law during the 1960-61 session of Parliament. If my count is correct, there have been 59 of them. As you know, the jury recommendations, or lack of them, are public knowledge. I have done a little investigation, which indicates that a minimum of 36 out of the 59 received a unanimous recommendation of mercy from the jury. My research has been a little complicated by the fact that the sentences of an additional seven men were automatically commuted when Bill C-168 came into force on January 1, 1968, because their crimes were no longer punishable by death. A total of 16 did not receive a recommendation of any kind, but seven of those were the men I just mentioned who received automatic commutation when the law regarding capital murder was changed.

Perhaps we should reflect on the fact that comparatively few jurors who took part in all those trials specifically recommended against clemency. Even in Moncton recently, where feeling was undoubtedly inflamed by the brutal murders which occurred, the jury which convicted the two men declined to make any recommendation.

The judge may include his own recommendation, if he so desires, but it is not made public so we have no readily available information on that particular aspect. However, with a little bit of digging I was able to find a couple of interesting facts. In all this list of 59 men, there was only one instance where the jury voted against clemency, but the judge recommended it. There was one instance where the jury voted for clemency, but the judge recommended against it.

When one considers the record as we know it—and there are many factors about each case to which we are not privy—how can anyone state that the government has wantonly or capriciously used the powers vested in it? With great deference, I believe it has carefully and conscientiously considered each case on its merits, and according to its standards as it conceives them; and who is to decide who has the greater wisdom?

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Honourable senators, Bill S-21 has received careful consideration from this house. I am sure we have all benefited from the constructive and informed comment about a wide range of social and legal problems which its subject has engendered. Nevertheless, it is obvious that we remain divided as to what the bill seeks to do or, in fact, can accomplish. I would therefore move the following amendment to the motion before us:

That the bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

● (2100)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by Honourable Senator Eudes, that this bill be now read a second time.

In amendment, it is moved by Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by Honourable Senator Norrie, that this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to see this bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, but in the meantime I move that the debate on this motion in amendment be adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by Honourable Senator Eudes, that this debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Capital Budget of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for the year ending December 31, 1975, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1975-1066, dated May 8, 1975, approving same.

TAX TREATIES

COUNTRIES WITH WHICH CANADA HAS CONCLUDED
TREATIES OR CONVENTIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 15 the Honourable Senator Grosart asked a question relating to tax treaties or conventions between Canada and certain countries in the matter of double taxation and fiscal evasion. He asked with what countries we had such tax treaties or conventions, or with what countries we were negotiating revisions of existing treaties.

In reply to that question, I should like to provide the following information:

Canada has now 16 double taxation agreements in force with other countries. They are:

|-----------|--------------------------|
| Australia | Netherlands |
| Denmark | New Zealand |
| Finland | Norway |
| France | South Africa |
| Germany | Sweden |
| Ireland | Trinidad and Tobago |
| Jamaica | United Kingdom |
| Japan | United States of America |

Following the 1971 tax reform, the government announced its intention to renegotiate these existing agreements. To date, discussions with the following countries have been held:

|--------------------|--------------------------|
| Finland | New Zealand |
| France (concluded) | Norway |
| Germany | Sweden |
| Ireland | Trinidad and Tobago |
| Jamaica | United Kingdom |

With respect to the question of the status of Canadians in their relations with countries with which Canada does not have a double taxation convention, problems of double taxation may arise in certain cases. For example, Canadians exercising professional activities, participating in cooperation or development assistance projects or generally investing in such countries, may encounter difficulties with the interaction of the Canadian and foreign tax systems.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 15, the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-19, to provide for payments in respect of wheat produced and sold in Canada for human consumption in Canada.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before making a few remarks on Bill C-19, the Two-Price Wheat Act, perhaps I should mention once again that I do not have an agricultural background, just in case this does not become apparent in my discussion of the bill.

Some hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Macdonald: I have done some reading on the subject of wheat. I have read the proceedings in the other place and the reports of the Agriculture Committee of the House of Commons. Consequently, I have obtained a somewhat limited and wholly academic knowledge of the subject matter of the bill. Let me give you an example of what I mean.

I read an article in the Encyclopaedia Britannica on this subject, and from that article alone it is obvious that the history of wheat would be a fascinating study. The article mentions that nearly all important civilizations are considered to have been founded upon the production of cereals, and that wheat was probably one of the first cereals grown by man. Indeed, it states that in all probability wheat was grown before there was any recorded history. Since wheat production required planting and harvesting on an annual basis, it meant that man had to settle in permanent locations to cultivate it, and so civilizations grew. It is of interest also to note that of all the cultivated land in the world, which is about 3,554 million acres, something over 536,800,000 acres is used for the growing of wheat.

While reading about wheat I realized once again how fortunate it is for us that we in Canada can grow such huge crops of wheat. We produced 605 million bushels last year. It also occurred to me that perhaps we do not always appreciate what a tremendous factor and force wheat has been in the growth and development of Canada. The growing and selling of wheat is a great Canadian industry. It is an industry which is mainly concentrated, of course, in the Prairie provinces. But since it is a great Canadian industry, it is of benefit to all Canadians regardless of where they may live.

Wheat has helped to make Canada a great trading nation; its sale abroad has certainly helped our balance of trade and it has provided us with foreign exchange so that we could buy abroad, and it has encouraged countries to which we sell wheat to sell to us more goods and thus both sides have benefited.

If we agree that the growing and selling of wheat is a great Canadian industry, one which is of benefit to all Canadians, it follows in the most logical manner that if this industry needs some assistance then all of Canada is under an obligation to provide that assistance. This can be done by the Canadian consumer paying more for the end product, or by a government subsidy or by a combination of both measures. And, by providing the consumer subsidy under Bill C-19 the government is not breaking new ground; it is not creating any new precedents. Subsidies to industry are part of our Canadian economic system. To mention just a few, subsidies have been provided for gold mining, for coal mining, for shipbuilding, for the fishing industry, and I don't know how many more industries. Bill C-19 provides, as the title indicates, that there be a two-price system for wheat, a domestic price and an export price. What the bill does is stated in a very concise manner on page 53 of the report of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is as follows:

... on September 11, 1973, the government introduced a two-price system for wheat used for human consumption in Canada. Under the system the prices to be charged to Canadian mills in the 1973-74 crop year under this policy are basis $3.25 per bushel for the basic grade of Spring Wheat and $5.75 for Durum. To compensate the board for having to sell at these lower prices to Canadian mills, the new system also provided for a consumer subsidy to be paid to the board, being the difference between the prices to mills and the current export prices of these grains, with a maximum subsidy in each case of $1.75 per bushel.

As you know, this policy was not put into effect in 1973 by statute because of various reasons, so it was put into effect by Order in Council. That was P.C. 1973-2689, dated September 11, 1973. But now it is to be enshrined in the law by this bill until July 31, 1980.

It is of interest also, that the Wheat Board Report further states:

Included in the operating results for the 1973-74 pool account for wheat are a total of $68,734,193 bushels of Spring and Durum Wheat applicable under the policy.

The subsidy related to these bushels amounted to $118,179,483, which has been included in the sales realizations of the pool account.

Now, of course, the total amount of the subsidy will be somewhat higher than that as some payments were made to the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board and also, I believe, to some individual producers.

Honourable senators, while the principle of a two-price system for wheat has been in effect in Canada for the past few years, it has only been on a year-to-year basis. Under Bill C-19 the policy will become part of our statute law, to remain in effect, as I have said, until the end of July, 1980.

• (1410)

The principle of a two-price wheat system has been generally accepted and has received general approval. However, a difference of opinion has developed as to the details of the bill. Senator Argue in his speech on May 15 last stated in a clear and understandable manner exactly the main objection, which is that while the act is to remain in force until July 31, 1980, there is no escalator clause to take care of any increase in the cost of production. In my opinion this is a very valid objection. I have seen no figures, but I expect that the cost of producing wheat must have increased since September 1973. I do not believe anyone would be sufficiently rash to suggest that there is a guarantee against any further increase in the cost of production between now and 1980. Therefore, if the $3.25 and the subsidy of $1.75 gave a reasonable return to the producer of the grade of wheat involved when it was first given them, it is only logical to assume that he should receive a higher price as his costs increase. I understand, also, that the grade in question, No. 1 Canada Western Red Spring wheat, which is 13.5 per cent protein, is the most expensive to grow. Even if the prices provided in this bill are acceptable today, who knows what may happen in the next few years? I appreciate that clause 5.(3) is intended to provide a measure of protection. But, like Senator Argue, I do not feel that it will prove to be very effective. I, too, believe that the bill would be greatly improved by providing an escalator clause, or some type of indexing. In my opinion the producer of the wheat in question, and indeed, of all other grades of wheat, is entitled to a fair and reasonable return, not only for his labour but on his investment. He is also entitled, in my opinion, to extra compensation for the risks which are part of his work. Many factors are involved in both the growing and selling of wheat, over which the producer has no control. They are factors which can adversely affect him. If the weather is bad he runs the risk of a poor crop, or no crop. Even if there is a large crop, the grades may be down, as happened in the past year, in which case he would be again adversely affected by circumstances beyond his control. I believe that all these aspects should be taken into account when discussing the price a wheat producer should receive.

While Bill C-19 will be helpful, I wholly agree with Senator Argue in his statement that, while this is a moderately good bill, with one or two amendments it could be made into an excellent bill.

Some hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bourget: We have a new farming expert on the other side of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald, that this bill be now read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Petten, seconded by Senator Giguère, that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I question whether it is correct to have the motion presented and seconded by members of the Senate who are not in the chamber. In my opinion it would have been more correct for the motion to have been moved on their behalf, or for two other senators to have moved and seconded the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: I put the question in the names of Senator Petten and Senator Giguère. They are both here.

Senator Flynn: They know enough about it too.

Motion agreed to.

CRIME AND VIOLENCE

PROPOSED SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator McGrand, seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes:

That the Senate considers it desirable that a special committee of the Senate be established at an early date to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, as Senator Desruisseaux has indicated a desire to continue this debate, does he have the consent of the Senate to do so?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, it is warm today and therefore I do not intend to be long.

[Translation]

Two thousand years ago, Aesop voiced some advice that is still valid in this day and age: Beware of those who are unaware of their ignorance because they are dangerous.

This does not apply to Senator McGrand, who introduced Wednesday last a motion to establish at an early date a special committee of the Senate to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society. His position and his views on the incidence of crime and violence in this country were brilliantly explained. He gave us food for thought.

Senator McGrand, a well known and highly respected physician, has a vast experience of Canadian social problems.

During his public career, he served for many years his fellow New Brunswickers as Minister of Health and Social Services. I believe he is now vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies. His expertise on the matter now before this house is recognized.

[English]

I can go along with the greater part of the reasoning and argument of Senator McGrand on the incidence of crime and violence in our Canadian society. Moreover, I recognize the validity of the thinking of our experienced, dedicated and knowledgeable senator, and I support his motion.

There has been little or no major Canadian study of crime and violence in our society. The problem has not yet been subjected to any serious analysis. Our human behaviour regarding crime and violence in Canadian society needs to be looked into, and an inquiry into the causes of the increase would help in establishing effective deterrents toward curbing it.

It will be remembered by many senators that a few decades ago psychiatrists and psychologists were strongly advising parents not to punish, correct or reprimand their children, and never to inflict bodily punishment because it would destroy their initiative.

Senator Flynn: I have survived.

Senator Desruisseaux: Yes, with some injuries. Facing the facts of life and actual results, this advice has now been reconsidered and altered. If you read current books on child rearing, you will have to agree. It was found that such attitudes by parents towards their children resulted in the destruction of parental respect and authority, and created a sort of degenerated free moral behaviour. As well, it often brought about uncontrolled aggressiveness. It was no longer to be generally recommended for the guidance of our human society.

The human being is a strange animal indeed. In reading the Old and the New Testaments, which are mankind's greatest and most accurate historical documents of human behaviour, we find a history full of violence and crime. The family of our first parents started the violence with the killing of Abel by Cain, and that was without the help of violent television programs. Since then, crime and violence have continued to the present time in varying degrees. It is the accounting for the varying degrees, through deep probing, that may help to restore a better moral equilibrium in our society.

We have been given a degree of intelligence. We have in ourselves natural guidelines, and we are blessed with tested religious directives. It is up to us to see that these natural and religious guidelines are not set aside.

A crime is a crime, and society has a duty to prevent its occurrence or re-occurrence. Violence cannot be justified.

It can only be explained to some extent. Society must repress violence on all occasions to retain order. First of all we must try to prevent crime and violence, and when it occurs we must be sure to counteract it by punishing the transgressors equitably. That is the price of the preservation of a good society.

Senator McGrand referred to the harm caused by television shows depicting crime and violence. He believes it to be one of the principal causes of many of the troubles of our society. As far as I am concerned, it is poor parental upbringing that eventually sets the worst pattern of crime and violence in our young people. The taking over of the whole parental education by the schools has left a vacuum, because of the absence of direct, immediate family education in the upbringing of children.

If television programs contribute to crime and violence, as seems to be the case, I do not believe it can be singled out as the principal cause. To me, the abandonment of the primary education provided by parents, the absence of religious and parental discipline, the absence of recognized guidelines in life, have contributed largely to the present deplorable situation. Of course, to these can be added the effects of degenerated reading material in newspapers, magazines and books glorifying immorality and free love, and justifying crime and violence as a way of life which does but little harm to the individual and to society. I will also state here that the urbanization we so strongly advocate is perhaps one of the greatest causes of the breeding and propagation of violence and crime in our Canadian society. Statistics tend to show that.

Like Senator McGrand, I think a thorough committee inquiry into the problems of violence and crime in our contemporary Canadian society would help clear some of the general confusion that now prevails, and enable us to use to greater advantage many much needed deterrents. There seems to be no better way to do it efficiently, at least that I know of.

May I comment at this time that the Senate is very active in its committee work, although I must regretfully add that the media has yet to find its way to give it the full recognition it deserves. The Senate has nine standing committees, one special standing committee and six joint Senate and House of Commons committees. As we know, there are now ten vacancies in the Senate, with unfortunately more to come soon. There are approximately six or seven senators on chronic sickness leave.

A fair assessment of the situation in the Senate is that we have some 85 senators out of the possible 102 serving on a regular basis, with a minimum 70 to 75 per cent attendance record, I believe. Out of these, an appreciable number of senators are required to be on missions, assignments and special duties everywhere in the world. The remaining senators probably provide the highest attendance in any Senate anywhere.

The formation of a number of special committees or subcommittees has often been suggested, but we have scarcely been able to provide them, for the reason I have stated.

A distress signal should now be sent to the Prime Minister. Of course, the filling of the ten vacancies with good and experienced Canadians would be most helpful. Somehow I feel that the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate would be appreciative of any relief given to the representatives on his side. When the decision to fill the vacancies is made, the magnanimity of the Prime Minister could do just that.

In the meantime, I will support the constructive motion of Senator McGrand to establish a special committee of the Senate to inquire into and report on crime and violence in our contemporary Canadian society. I believe it would be a constructive contribution.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN TEXTILE PROBLEMS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Desruisseaux calling the attention of the Senate to Canadian textile problems.—(Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C.).

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I should like to yield to Senator Perrault.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, some days ago I promised to make a statement about the government's position vis-à-vis the textile policy. I have a brief statement which I should like to present to the Senate this afternoon. May I at the outset say that the government has no intention of allowing the Canadian textile industry to disappear. On the contrary, the record will show that the government has regularly taken prompt and positive action to aid the Canadian textile industry. The other day in the chamber I outlined some of the recent steps which have been taken in this regard. I should like to advise honourable senators that the Honourable Alastair Gillespie is currently reviewing with his Textile Policy advisers the 1970 policy developed by the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin.

The position of the government at the present time is that the most useful way of studying the textile industry problems is by this departmental review. There is no present intention to introduce measures in the House of Commons to study this matter, in view of the review which is going ahead in the department. May I say, however, that in May of 1970, when the textile policy was enunciated in the House of Commons, the view of the government was that the Canadian textile industry was capable of meeting competition in Canada from the exports of developed countries without special measures of protection.

The Textile Policy specifically rejected the alternatives of guaranteeing the Canadian industry a specified share of the Canadian market as well as the protection of obsolete or obsolescent sectors of the industry. These were two of the main lines of the 1970 policy announced at that time.

It was explicitly, and implicitly, assumed that the Canadian textile industry would move progressively to the manufacture of products where growing markets and/or reduced labour intensity would reduce their inherent disadvantages opposite developing countries. Government assistance, mainly through the amended General Adjustment Assistance Program, has been available to help the industry make such adjustments as are necessary.

Special measures of protection other than the tariff, that is, quantitative limitations on imports, were to be implemented only after an independent body, the Textile and Clothing Board, had conducted an inquiry and concluded that imports, in particular low-cost imports, were causing or threatening serious injury to Canadian production of the item or items under investigation.

As indicated previously, the role of the Textile and Clothing Board is to determine whether imports, notably from low-wage countries, are causing or threatening serious injury to Canadian producers and their employees, and, if so, to make appropriate recommendations to the government through a report to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on the special measures of protection considered necessary.

It should be stressed that the board is an independent body charged not only with examination of possible injury to the industry and its employees but also with taking into account the plans of the industry to improve its competitiveness, the interest of Canadian consumers and the obligations that Canada has assumed under international agreements such as GATT and the Arrangement Regarding International Trade and Textiles.

The board was not given, and has not assumed, the mandate to determine the government's policy in the textile field or to assure the continuation of the industry in a healthy or in an unhealthy state. It is the view of the government that the members and staff of the Textile and Clothing Board have been very diligent in carrying out the duties assigned to them by the act setting up the board. This was especially true in the three-month period ending February 28, 1975, when the board conducted a concurrent inquiry into six textile products.

It can be said that the board has not hesitated to use the provisions for emergency action as exemplified by the interim reports presented on broadwoven nylon filament fabrics and men's and boys' fine suits. Some of that information was given to the Senate the other day.

As I have mentioned, the Textile and Clothing Board has recently completed a concurrent inquiry into the impact of imports upon Canadian production of six textile products. This inquiry into broadwoven nylon and polyester fabrics, double and warp-knit fabrics, worsted fabrics, polyester-cotton fabrics and textured polyester filament yarn was undertaken at the specific request of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce following his meeting in mid-November, 1974, with the labour-management committee of the Canadian Textile Industry. The committee had identified these products as priority items for examination. After a careful and detailed investigation of all the information and views presented to it, and taking into account the interests of workers and consumers as well as Canada's international obligations, the board found that serious injury was occurring or that there was a threat of serious injury because of imports of nylon and polyester filament fabrics, double and warp-knit fabrics and worsted fabrics from certain sources. The board therefore recommended quantitative restrictions, which are now being negotiated with the countries involved. So the government is acting, and doing so directly and forcefully, to meet the problem which exists.

Use of the import permit mechanism, which was developed either to control imports or to obtain more specific information on imports, was also recommended in a number of cases. Since January 1, 1975, the government has placed certain textile products on the import control list.

Honourable senators, I suggest to you that the following list of products and their sources exemplifies the government's concern with the problem and the action which it is taking:

| IMPORT CONTROL LIST | |
|-----------------------------------|--|
| Product | Source |
| Cotton yarn | All countries |
| Nylon filament fabric | Korea, Poland, Taiwan |
| Polyester filament fabric | Korea |
| Worsteds fabrics | China, Czechoslovakia |
| Double-knit and warp-knit fabrics | All countries |
| Worsteds spun acrylic yarn | All countries |
| Textured polyester filament yarn | All countries |
| Men's fine suits | Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Romania, Poland, Hungary |

In the case of textured polyester filament yarn, the Textile and Clothing Board considered the imposition of a duty surtax rather than the introduction of quantitative limitations of imports as the appropriate measure. The government decided that further information and analysis was required before taking a step involving such serious trade implications. This process should be far enough advanced before the end of May to enable the government to decide whether surtax action is warranted and appropriate. So there should be information about this particular problem this month.

Those who comment on the problems relating to polyester-cotton fabrics should bear in mind these following facts. Of the 16.1 million pounds imported in the first 11 months of 1974, 5.1 million pounds originated in the United States. These included a substantial volume of polyester-cotton sheeting which had been shipped from Canada to the United States for finishing and was thus being returned to Canada. Secondly, almost all imports of polyester-cotton fabrics from Taiwan were griegie fabrics, imported by Canadian fabric producers for finishing and subsequent sale in Canada. Some of the imports from Japan were of the same character, and this is another significant factor. There was a great deal of finishing right here in Canada.

The Textile and Clothing Board is currently inquiring into whether or not imports of men's and boys' suits are causing or threatening serious injury to the Canadian producers, and an inquiry into rayon filament fabrics has been announced. In view of all these actions which the government has taken, and is taking, the suggestion of indifference on the part of the government, or of implementing a policy that adversely affects the people in any part of this country, or is detrimental or harmful to them, appears in all honesty to be unwarranted in the face of the evidence which the department produces. The Canadian textile industry is suffering from a severe recession which is worldwide. The problem of the Canadian textile industry is not unique, as I think honourable senators are aware. The textile industry in other countries is in serious condition and, indeed, in some parts of the world, in far more serious condition than it is in Canada. There are tentative indications that this decline may have run its course in other countries, and we may have reason to hope that this will soon be the case in Canada. When the recovery will commence, and the extent to which it will occur, are matters of conjecture, but the outlook is hopeful.

With regard to our international agreements, the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles was designed to achieve the progressive liberalization of world trade in textiles, while at the same time ensuring the orderly and equitable development of this trade. While it contains a number of safeguards against indiscriminate flooding of markets by imported products, it also recognizes the need for developing countries to enlarge their exports of textiles and textile products at a normal growth rate of at least 6 per cent a year. This growth rate can be held to a lower figure, but it is the view of the government that it should be only under very exceptional circumstances and clearly defined and stringent rules. The government considered, when it acceded to the arrangement, that an internationally supervised set of rules for trade in textiles provided the best hope for industry stability while also recognizing our interests in the improvement of the economies of developing countries. The government sees no reason to reconsider this decision. Accordingly, Canada must honour the international obligations it assumed under the arrangement.

I want to assure honourable senators of the continuing concern of the government regarding the problems facing those in the textile industry in Canada, wherever they may live in this country, and particularly for the workers whose incomes are very directly affected by the strength of that sector in our economy.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I realize that I brought this subject before the Senate, and I intend to pursue it at a later date, if I am allowed to do so after making a few comments at this time. I see that the Deputy Leader of the Government is indicating no. I wonder why.

Senator Langlois: I am not addressing that sign to you, my friend.

Senator Flynn: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Desruisseaux: I am not closing the debate. I wish to give the first part of my remarks today and then adjourn the debate until next Tuesday. Can I do that?

Senator Grosart: Yes, but it should be determined whether you are the last speaker.

Senator Flynn: You have already spoken in this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator has already spoken on the subject. Does any other senator wish to take part in the debate?

Senator Desruisseaux: I would like to have the Senate's permission to make some concluding remarks.

Senator Flynn: Madam Speaker, the honourable senator wants to close the debate, so I think the house should be so advised.

Senator Croll: He does not want to close it today, though.

Senator Flynn: It does not matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: This is a debate on an inquiry, not a bill.

Senator Grosart: It is the same thing.

Senator Desruisseaux: Madam Speaker, if any other senator wants to speak now, that is fine. I can make my remarks later.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the government's policy on the textile industry. Will the leader agree to having this subject-matter referred to the appropriate Senate committee for study along the lines discussed here by certain senators?

Senator Perrault: I certainly do not resist the idea, but I would point out that the exceptional workload now being borne by the committees may make it very difficult to undertake such a study in the near future. As I say, I do not resist the idea of referring this important subject to a committee. Perhaps it would be appropriate to have some other expressions of opinion on the subject of this inquiry, which is important. But there certainly is a staffing problem as far as our present committee work schedule is concerned. Setting up another special committee would create additional problems. It would be especially onerous for members of the loyal Opposition, I suggest.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the Honourable Senator Desruisseaux have leave to speak again?

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks, and then adjourn the debate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Desruisseaux: I am sure that the Leader of the Government is well aware that the textile manufacturers and the textile workers have been waiting for some two years for relief. I say to the Leader of the Government that their case is extremely important, as he readily admits, because for one thing the textile industry represents some 20 per cent of the total employment of Quebec. This statement will be substantiated later in my remarks.

This subject is of vital importance and we cannot wait any longer. Imports are increasing while we are having a depression. Having said this, I do not want to prolong the afternoon's session. I would like, with your permission, to come back next Tuesday and make a few comments on the report that we heard. I will then present some additional facts and statistics, and you will see for yourselves the problems of the textile industry. I do not intend to burden the Senate with statistics, but some of them are important.

The very fact that we are considering setting aside this problem in the Senate will surely have repercussions, certainly in my province where the problem is very serious. They will say, "The Senate started to inquire into the textile situation and then they stopped. Why?" I am not ready to see that happen in the Senate, and therefore I will present further arguments next Tuesday.

On motion of Senator Desruisseaux, debate adjourned.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

REGULATIONS RESPECTING ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS—SUBJECT-MATTER REFERRED TO INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey moved pursuant to notice:

That, pursuant to section 40 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Senate make regulations rendering more stringent upon members of the Senate the provisions of that Act that relate to attendance of senators and to deductions to be made from the sessional allowance and that, as a preliminary procedure in the making of such regulations, the following proposed regulations be adopted by the Senate for the purposes of section 3 of the Statutory Instruments Act:

Regulations of the Senate respecting attendance of Senators at sittings of the Senate and deductions to be made from the sessional allowance

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Senate Attendance Regulations.

2. A deduction at the rate of $180.00 per day shall be made from the sessional allowance of a senator for every day

(a) beyond eleven, in the case of a Senator who represents the Province of Ontario or Quebec,

(b) beyond sixteen, in the case of a senator who represents the Province of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, and

(c) beyond twenty-one, in the case of a senator who represents the Province of British Columbia or Newfoundland, on which the senator does not attend a sitting of the Senate, if the Senate sits on such day.

3. (1) Subject to subsection 2, in each calendar year no more than a total number of 15 days on which a senator is unable to attend a session by reason of illness shall be reckoned as days of attendance at that session.

(2) Where in any calendar year the number of days on which a senator is unable to attend a session by reason of illness is less than the maximum number of such days that may be reckoned as days of attendance under this section for that year, the difference between that number and the maximum number may be added to the maximum number of such days that may be so reckoned under this section in any subsequent year.

(3) In this section, "calendar year" includes the year in which a person is appointed to the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, before I deal with the substance of this motion, I think I should explain the reference therein to the Statutory Instruments Act. I was considerably surprised, I must confess, when I was advised that any regulation passed by the Senate was subject to the provisions of that act. I do not believe that when the act was passed it was ever intended that that should be the case; I think it was purely an oversight.

The result, however, is that the Senate cannot pass a motion involving a regulation without going through the procedures of the Statutory Instruments Act, which means that we must first decide what we are proposing, and we then submit the regulation to the Privy Council office. They consult with the Justice Department, and they consider whether it is ultra vires and whether the draftsmanship is in accordance with accepted standards, and then they advise us of any comments they may have. It is only after that is done and the motion is passed a second time, and registered under the provisions of that act, that it takes effect and becomes law.

In my speech to this house on May 7, on the second reading of Bill C-44, I discussed at some length the reasons why I was going to propose this motion. I do not intend to repeat what I said on that occasion, other than to try to clear up some misconceptions which appear to have arisen in the minds of some senators as to what I am trying to accomplish by this motion, and the purpose behind some of my remarks.

I thought I had made my position perfectly clear but, quite frankly, the reaction I got from some senators after I had finished my speech, as evidenced by their questions and comments, made me feel rather depressed, because I felt that it must have been a very poor speech indeed to have been so misunderstood. Such critical remarks as "infantile statistical analysis," and "inaccurate and unfair," are not exactly designed to boost one's ego particularly when the leaders of the three political parties represented in this chamber at the same time apparently accepted as gospel the really preposterous statement of Senator Lawson that there are more than 1,000 civil servants in Ottawa alone earning in excess of $60,000 a year.

However, when I re-read my speech in Hansard's "blues" later that afternoon my spirits somewhat revived, because if my speech was misunderstood by some senators I really do not think that I was entirely to blame.

There is one other point I think I might mention at this time, and that is that some senators apparently felt that I had done the Senate a great disservice by stating in detail the statistics as to the number of days of sittings in each year in the Senate and in the Commons. One of the reasons I had set them out in detail, rather than just mentioning averages, was because if you examine the statistics in detail it will become apparent why in certain years the Senate, as well as the House of Commons, did not sit that often. These were, of course, election years, and they brought the yearly average down considerably.

What these statistics did show was that in recent years there has been a significant increase in the number of days the Senate has sat in non-election years, and a significant increase in relationship to the number of sittings of the House of Commons. There is certainly nothing to be ashamed of in the fact that the Senate averaged 54 per cent of the number of sittings of the Commons. Any knowledgeable person understands why, and those who are not knowledgeable, and who are thus liable to be prejudiced against the Senate, think that we sit much less often than that, and probably will never be able to understand how this place really operates, and the great work it does, any better than I did until I had been a member of this house for some time.

Recently, the press has delighted on occasion in giving statistics as to the number of hours the Senate sits in a week, which is completely misleading. On a day when the Senate might sit for only half an hour there may well be many committee meetings going on all day, and the press is really giving a completely false picture when it publishes those figures without mentioning that the number of hours the Senate sits during a week is no indication whatsoever of how hard senators work, because attendance at committee meetings usually takes up the majority of our time on the days when the Senate is sitting.

Now, can I rightfully be accused of being equally misleading when I gave the figures showing the relative number of sitting days of the Senate and Commons in each of the last 11 years? Certainly not. In my opinion—and I feel very strongly about this—I would have been misleading and less than frank if I had not given these figures when debating the question of whether or not senators should be paid the same sessional indemnity as members of the Commons. Any argument—and do not forget that I was arguing that they should—must be based on the actual facts, and not on concealment of them. Honourable senators who objected to my giving the figures must have their heads in the sand if they think for one moment that members of the press, the media and the public generally are not fully aware of the fact that the Senate sits much less often than the Commons. Who do we think we are kidding if we do not disclose the actual figures, which the media and anyone else can obtain in a few minutes, just as I did?

Senator Manning, as you may recall, did use as one of his arguments as to why senators should not be paid as much as members of the Commons the fact that we did not sit as often. While admitting the facts and giving the actual figures, I pointed out that from personal experience—and I quote from my own speech—"the conscientious senator has no difficulty turning his duties into a full-time job when Parliament is in session." I also stated that there are other senators who, while not making it a full-time job, make an excellent contribution, often at considerable financial sacrifice, and that these senators should also, in my opinion, receive the same sessional allowance as members of the House of Commons, but I made this caveat, namely, provided they are regular in their attendance.

Her Honour, the Speaker, in her speech on Senate reform, which I quoted and will quote again, said:

Devotion to work is obviously related to the interest shown in the sittings of the Senate as well as those of the standing committees.

I completely agree with that statement. If a senator consistently does not turn up for sittings of the Senate or of the standing committees of which he is a member, and, I should add, investigative committees—and in that respect

I am thinking of the outstanding work of committees chaired by men like Senator Lamontagne and Senator Croll—then I find it impossible to believe that such a senator is either devoted to his work or makes any meaningful contribution to the work of the Senate. There is no way that it can be argued that such a senator should be paid the same as members of the House of Commons or as much as the conscientious senators unless, of course, you happen to agree with the statement made by Senator O'Leary 20 years before he was appointed to the Senate, that a senatorship is not a job, it is a title, and that it is wrong to think of the Senate as a place where people are supposed to work, because pensions are not given for work. I disagree most emphatically with Senator O'Leary, and I am sure he has changed his own mind in the matter. If there is anyone in this house who really believes that a senatorship is just a substitute for a pension they certainly have not admitted it to me.

In any event, it has long been the established principle in this house that the compensation of senators should bear some relationship to their attendance, and that they should be penalized for non-attendance without excuse. I am saying that we should look at this question at this time, now that we have received a significant increase in our indemnity and sessional expense allowance, in view of the fact that the last time anything was done about this was in 1963. At that time, when the sessional allowance was increased from $8,000 to $12,000 per year, the daily deduction from the sessional allowance for non-attendance was increased from $40 to $60, plus $60 from the expense allowance.

If it was logical to have a total daily deduction of $120 for non-attendance in 1963, when the sessional allowance was $12,000 and the expense allowance was $2,000, then surely it is logical to have the total at least doubled in 1975, now that we are getting $24,000, plus an expense allowance of $5,300. Furthermore, how can anyone seriously argue that the permissible days of absence without excuse for senators should ordinarily be the same as for members of the House of Commons, when we sit much less often?

I arrived at the 11-day figure for senators from Ontario and Quebec by simply multiplying 21 by 54 per cent, which produces 11.34 days, and I rounded it down to 11. I thought there should be some recognition of the fact that senators other than those from Ontario and Quebec do have much more onerous travelling problems—so onerous in fact that there are a fair number who have permanent residences in Ottawa and who spend a great deal more time here than senators from Ontario and Quebec. Admittedly, I was arbitrary in picking out the figure of 16 for those from the Maritimes and the Prairies, but if someone has a better idea let us hear about it.

I would like now to deal with some of the specific comments made and questions asked during my speech on Bill C-44. When I ended my speech by stating that the permissible days of absence on account of illness should be limited to 15 days per calendar year, which would be fully cumulative, Senator Flynn asked me how my health was. That question reminds me of my wife's immediate reaction some months ago when I told her what I intended to propose. She said, "Why do you want to push that sort of thing? You may have a stroke some day, and then you will be sorry." An honourable and, I might add, a personally friendly senator, who happens to be well aware of my medical history, made exactly the same remark to me after I had made my speech.

Senator Molson brought up the question of committee attendance. He stated:

If we are going to start modifying the basis on which we receive our just reward for our just effort, some consideration at the same time should be given to the very valuable work done by many of our committee members who meet on days or at times when the Senate itself is not sitting.

As to sitting on days when the Senate is not sitting, I stated that in my limited experience Senate committees have met on the same days as the Senate sits—namely, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays. Senator Molson, as reported at page 875 of Hansard, said:

Not necessarily. That is not fair.

I replied:

If that is wrong, I would like honourable senators to point out the number of days in this session, not on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, that Senate committees have met.

Having received no reply or information from any senator on that subject, I got in touch with the Director of the Committees Branch, who has a record of all dates and times that Senate committees have met, and I asked him if there were any days since this session started on which any Senate or joint Senate-Commons committees had met other than the days that the Senate itself sat. He replied in writing that there were not. Since I received that letter the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy has taken to the road and did meet last week on Monday night in Montreal, and on Friday morning in Quebec City. It will be meeting on Mondays or Fridays on five other occasions before completing its tour across Canada.

I am well aware, of course, that when investigative committees such as the Special Senate Committee on Poverty and the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy were operating they sat on many days when the Senate was not sitting. I would be surprised, however, if there were not on those committees certain senators who were not reasonably faithful in their attendance.

In closing the debate, Senator Perrault disclosed his own concern, and the concern, I understand, of many other senators, at my giving certain figures when he stated:

Some so-called attendance figures may appear in your favourite newspaper tomorrow—and it will be possible to question and refute every one of them.

When he made this statement in his speech I thought he was being unduly concerned, and the press reports since confirm my opinion. I did not really think that the press would consider the average attendance figures I gave as news, particularly as they were much better than the impression the public now has as to the average attendance in this house. I should have pointed out, however, that there are, of course, senators absent on public business from time to time, just as a number of us were absent last week because we were attending the hearings of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy in Quebec. To give the correct impression, as Senator Desruisseaux has pointed out, such senators should be taken into consideration when figures are given as to attendance at sittings of this house.

Ordinarily there is only one reporter in the Senate press gallery, and that is the one representing Canadian Press. That organization has a propensity for quoting remarks which make individual senators and, by implication, the Senate look foolish. How did the press report our debate on the salaries bill? Well, as to the press I saw, the Gazette and the Globe and Mail completely ignored the whole debate, and the report which appeared in the Toronto Star did not contain a word about my speech, but did mention Senator Manning's proposal that members of the House of Commons should receive less for their first and second terms than veteran MPs who had served longer. Senator Manning's proposal, of course, would have resulted in men like C. D. Howe, John Diefenbaker, Louis St. Laurent, Lester B. Pearson, J. W. Pickersgill, Pierre E. Trudeau and Marc Lalonde receiving less as members of Parliament during their first and second terms than veteran backbenchers.

The only other statement mentioned was the following by another senator:

Let us just wonder why we did not have guts enough to go ahead and take the 50 per cent that we should have taken in the first place.

The Canadian Press, in giving prominence to that remark in their news story, probably did so because they thought it represented the thinking of senators generally. Incidentally, I must give the press full marks for showing common sense and a high degree of responsibility when they did not report Senator Lawson's statement about the 1,000 civil servants in this city earning in excess of $60,000 a year which, if it had been true, surely would have been one of the stories of the year from Ottawa.

The Ottawa Journal, did, two days later, contain a verbatim report of my speech copied from the Senate Hansard, starting at that point on page 872 where I stated that I had found from personal experience that the conscientious senator has no difficulty turning his duties into a full-time job when Parliament is in session. Even that paper did not think its public would be interested in a detailed bunch of statistics about the sittings of the Senate, and they did not report any part of my speech which came earlier. The headline of their report read: "A Proposal to Catch Truant Senators," which I think demonstrated that the headline writer of that paper had a greater appreciation of what I was trying to accomplish than some honourable senators.

We all have read that there has been talk about Senate reform ever since this body was founded in 1867. Mr. King used to talk a great deal about it in the twenties. Mr. Diefenbaker threatened to fight an election on the issue in 1962, after the Senate had amended the Customs Tariff bill to provide for the right of appeal from arbitrary decisions of the Minister of National Revenue. Mr. Diefenbaker never went ahead with that threat, and it was never mentioned during the 1962 election. We have recently had a report on constitutional reform, which included proposals about the Senate. Now we have heard from the Prime Minister that he is definitely going to do something about it and, knowing the Prime Minister as I do, I believe that he will.

However, I do not think it behooves the Senate to sit back and leave the initiative with the Prime Minister and the Government. To the extent that we can reform ourselves, we should do so. I have pointed out one area in which we can effect immediate reform. I believe this is the right time to do it. We have just received a substantial increase in our indemnity, and a bill has been introduced in the other place rectifying the unfair anomalies respecting the pensions of senators appointed for life. If they are seriously affected by my motion they will be able to retire, when the new pension legislation is passed, with a decent pension.

I have made my suggestions in this motion. I honestly believe, if my suggestions are accepted, that the prestige of the Senate and its members will be greatly raised—not necessarily with the general public right away, because we cannot expect miracles, but certainly with a lot of people who count, including the members of the government, who will have a great deal to say in the not too distant future about the form and powers this body will have.

● (1510)

I believe sincerely that it is in the long-term interests of the Senate in general, and the conscientious members of the Senate in particular, that we pass this motion, and pass it without delay without appearing to drag our heels. Above all, and most important, I believe it should be passed because it is the right and proper thing to do.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, It seems to me there may be some merit in studying Senator Godfrey's motion in committee rather than debating it in detail in this chamber, because with the information now before us a debate here would not serve any useful purpose. Following careful committee study of the motion, and hearing all the evidence, a degree of agreement on the thrust of the proposal may emerge. The committee could then report back to the Senate on what further action should be taken.

With that in mind, and with leave of the Senate, I move:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Senator Flynn: You do not need leave.

Senator Langlois: Question?

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Cook, do you have a seconder for your motion?

Senator Croll: I will second it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Croll, are you the seconder?

Senator Cook: Yes. I move, seconded by Senator Croll—

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I should like to say that Senator Godfrey has done a useful service in bringing many of these matters into question. I do not quarrel with that. However, I am not completely happy with what he has recommended because in my opinion, he has not gone deep enough into the role which the Senate has played.

It is easy to say that he has not been here for very long but in my opinion, he has been here long enough to know the Senate, and he has fitted in very well. However, when he makes statements to the effect that he has checked with the Director of the Committees Branch as to whether any committee has sat during this session on days other than those on which the Senate has sat, I point out that that is really not an answer to what I suggested to him the other day.

Those of us who have been in the Senate for a few years longer than Senator Godfrey can recall Senator Croll's Committee on Poverty, the Special Committee on Land Use, and the committee that studied drug legislation some 20 years ago. Those committees sat on many days when the Senate was not sitting, and in places other than Ottawa.

Senator Langlois: Also the Science Policy Committee.

Senator Molson: Yes, that is true of many committees. It is simply not right to leave the impression that committees of the Senate normally sit only when the Senate has already been summoned back and senators receive their indemnity. It is just not so, and I rise to make this protest.

The Senate committee that dealt with drug legislation was established before I came to the Senate; it must have been in about 1953 or 1954. For over 20 years the Senate has had active committees, and the only limitation on their times of sitting has been the demand of the job they were undertaking.

Honourable senators have faced up to their responsibilities. They have done what was necessary to accomplish their task, and they have given freely of their time without worrying about whether the Senate was sitting next Tuesday, Wednesday, or on any given day.

To that extent, I wish to go on record as saying that Senator Godfrey has not done a useful service in leaving the impression that committees sit only when the Senate is sitting.

Apart from that, the question concerning those who do not attend, particularly now that the indemnity has again been raised, is a valid one. I do not disagree with Senator Cook's suggestion that the matter should be referred to committee.

However, I do not wish to leave the impression—which I am afraid I have received from Senator Godfrey's speech—that senators are here just to take the money and not provide service.

From my personal experience and observation over the years, I would say that senators have served to the best of their ability whenever they have been called upon to do so, and they have done so cheerfully. Certainly they have taken the indemnity which went with it, but there are few people in this country or the world who can serve for nothing.

Senator Croll: I should like the opportunity of expressing my views, since Senator Molson has raised the point. When I first came to the Senate, almost 22 years ago, the major work before the Senate was the matter of divorce. We dealt with all the divorce work which came from Quebec and other provinces. We sat here on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Croll: The work was done in committee. We sat each morning, and again each afternoon if necessary. Those of us who were lawyers had to take the disputed cases, which were long and difficult.

As a result, we were responsible for the enlightened legislation on divorce that followed. That was very important. The recommendations which were brought into effect—one being that county court judges deal with divorce cases—have been most helpful.

There is another important aspect, which the honourable senator's comments have brought to my mind. During the course of the Canada Pension Plan committee hearings we gave up our Christmas holidays because we wanted the bill through. About eight of us stayed here for three or four weeks. We received no allowance. We paid our own hotel bills. In the end, McCutcheon and I agreed that we should vote an allowance for living expenses, but the NDP said no; that they would raise it on the floor of the house. McCutcheon said, "Let's forget it," so we forgot it, and that was the end of that. It is as well to remember those events.

On the Aging Committee—I have the figures upstairs—and the Poverty Committee—Senator Grosart: You mean the Committee on Aging.

Senator Croll: Yes, the Committee on Aging, and also the Poverty Committee, sat for 185 days over a period of five years. I have the figures upstairs. I did not think this matter would arise. Not all of the members of the committee were present for all of those 185 days, but enough were there to constitute a committee. Some almost lived here. During that time, the chairman, the vice-chairman and others paid their expenses, and said nothing about it. Those expenses amounted to a fair sum.

Senator Lamontagne's committee sat under similar circumstances. His committee sat when the house was not in session. No one came to the Senate and complained. The work had to be done, and we did it.

● (1520)

I am not suggesting that we are overworked, but we should not be kicked about or condemned for something we did not do. What Senator Godfrey says is true inasmuch as it has not happened since his appointment to this chamber, but he is a new boy.

Senator Flynn: He will continue to appear to be a new boy.

Senator Croll: He did not read the record over the years, and that has to be done. I know what he is getting at. There are many things that need to be done, and they will be done. One cannot accomplish reform alone. Whatever reform needs to be carried out, we have to get it together in a package and sit down and look at it in an effort to get it done.

[Senator Croll.]

There are things far more important that need to be done by way of reform than that which has been considered today. Whether there is a deduction of $60 or $120, or whatever, does not really make any difference at all. That is not really a reform of the Senate. It is not going to reduce anyone's tax and it is not going to give anyone an advantage that he or she does not already have. When this matter is before the committee, that should be kept in mind. I intend to present the other side of the coin during the committee hearings so that the committee has a balanced picture of what is going on.

While we are on the subject of the Senate, I would mention that there are several appointments to be made, and we are not going to get those appointments until something is done about reform. Honourable senators are well aware of my views on that subject, but something has to be done by us; if not, it will be done by someone else. We might as well get down to doing it as quickly as possible.

I am pleased to second the motion that this subject-matter be referred to committee.

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

I would point out to honourable senators, and the Chair, in particular, that this resolution surely affects the balance of national accounts. That being so, it can only be dealt with by way of Treasury Board resolution presented by the Governor in Council. Therefore, I suggest that this resolution is outside the authority of the Senate.

Senator Croll: No. I think this would be a good exercise for us. We ought to participate in it.

Senator Godfrey: In reply to that, the opinion of the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel is that it is in order.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I do not intend to oppose the motion. However, I should like to make a few comments.

The debate up to now concerning the role of honourable senators has been, in my view, limited to the sittings of the Senate and the work of its committees. One very important area has been completely forgotten, that being the activities of senators outside the Senate on public business.

Many honourable senators are involved in making speeches across Canada, and in participating in meetings in the public interest. I think there are some in this chamber who devote more time to that area of activity than to the work of the Senate itself. In my opinion, it is very important for honourable senators to participate in that area, and I hope that when the committee considers this proposal in relation to the activities of the Senate, it will extend its inquiry to the outside activities of honourable senators.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I rise to ask a question. Before putting my question, however, I should like to complete the statement made by Senator Croll.

Soon after my appointment to this chamber, which was in 1966, the Special Senate Committee on Poverty held sittings all across Canada. In 1967 or 1968 the house adjourned at around the end of June, and for all of July and part of August the Special Senate Committee on Poverty travelled back and forth across Canada holding meetings. Following that, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee started its hearings in connection with the White Paper on Tax Reform, and, concurrent with that, the Science Policy committee held hearings.

As a result, the five or six senators who happened to be members of all three committees worked the whole summer with only a couple of weekends off. Senator Molson can verify that as he was a member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee at that time, as can Senator Lamontagne. In addition to that, if there were expenses to be borne, we bore them ourselves. Not a word was ever printed about what the Senate was doing in that respect.

Now for my question. As I understand it, the motion is to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. That committee does not print its proceedings. I am wondering whether an exception could be made in that policy so that the proceedings of the committee on this subject-matter are printed. I think it is a matter of public interest, and the proceedings should be printed.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, as chairman of that committee, this comes as a surprise to me. I was not aware that there would likely be this reference. Therefore, the question raised by Senator Carter will have to be taken into consideration. Also, I should warn the mover and seconder of the motion that the committee does have very important and pressing matters to deal with in the next six weeks. We cannot guarantee that we can turn our attention to this matter until next fall. Subject to that, I am willing to take it on.

Senator Flynn: Give it proper consideration.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, since this matter is to be referred to a committee, I am wondering why it is not being referred to the proper committee, which is the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, as provided under rule 67(1)(e).

An Hon. Senator: No, no.

Senator Prowse: That may be too logical a thing for this house to absorb in one simple movement, but it seems to me that this subject should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

If it is the wish of honourable senators to refer the matter to the Internal Economy Committee, there are certain things in what Senator Laird has said that do not commend that action to me. I suggest that some thought be given to referring it to the proper committee.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, there have been many remarks about the functioning of the Senate and its operations. Senator Croll referred to the "new boys" of the Senate, the newcomers, of which I am one. I have been a senator for about a year and a half, and I am proud to be a senator. I am proud of the job I feel I am accomplishing, together with my colleagues, for the benefit of the people of Canada. Whatever remuneration is paid to us, it is well deserved. As Senator Lamontagne has stated, we do not work only in the Senate itself, or in the committees of the Senate. We work with the public at large, day in and day out, throughout the country. The amount of money paid to senators is, to me, almost irrelevant, as Senator Molson has said.

● (1530)

The members of this house were dedicated before their appointments, and they still are—so much so that it is now a quarter to four and we have two committee meetings after the Senate rises. I suppose many senators would like me to say, "Let us go on with the committee meetings," and sit down. However, I cannot do so without leaving you with this message.

I believe that the amendment to refer the subject matter of the motion to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is in order, but I will vote against it because I do not think it should go before that or any other committee.

The original motion should be defeated, because I feel that this house is doing a fair and competent job for the people of this country. I make no apologies to anybody. I hope, indeed I know, that all my colleagues feel likewise. I will vote against the amendment to refer the subject matter of the motion to the Internal Economy Committee, and I will also vote against the motion of Senator Godfrey. It is perhaps a good thing that he brought certain matters to the attention of the Senate, although many of them we already knew.

Before resuming my seat, I repeat that I am proud to be a Canadian senator. I will continue to do my job, to perform my function, and I am very anxious right now to go to a committee meeting, which is to be followed by yet another committee meeting later this afternoon.

Senator Perrault: May I inquire, Madam Speaker, whether the point of order raised by Senator Greene has been dealt with?

The Hon. the Speaker: I think no point of order arises. I am advised it is a legal opinion, but we are not dealing with a bill. That is the problem. If I understand it correctly, Senator Greene's objection is based on rule 62, which says:

The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, in view of what Senator Laird said, which I think is quite right, I would ask that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which has been dealing with this matter.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Grosart: A ruling has been made.

Senator Croll: I think it is the appropriate committee.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Croll: Why not?

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of the rules of the Senate.

Senator Croll: It is a matter of the rules.

Senator Flynn: It is a question of administration.

Senator Croll: It is a matter of the house, but I think it belongs there.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, if no committee is going to take care of this matter, I wonder if we should not vote on the original motion so as to dispose of it immediately.

Senator Flynn: How can we?

Senator Greene: It is out of order. Madam Speaker ruled it out of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook:

That, pursuant to section 40 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Senate make regulations rendering—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Cook, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those in favour of Senator Cook's motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it. The motion in amendment of Senator Cook is carried, on division.

Senator Langlois: The motion as amended?

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion in amendment is carried. The subject-matter is referred to the committee.

Motion in amendment agreed to, on division.

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC PROVINCIAL POLICE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER FINANCIAL COMPENSATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider the question of financial compensation by the federal government for the maintenance, by the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, of their own police forces.

He said: Honourable senators, I am quite sure that if this matter is somewhat controversial, it will not be as controversial as the one raised by my good friend, Senator Godfrey. However, I assure you that I will not present it in the same light, or in the same perspective, as he did his motion.

Honourable senators will remember that Senator Deschatelets raised this problem on an inquiry. Several honourable senators spoke on the inquiry, and the Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Langlois, adjourned the debate on the inquiry. I was hoping that he would say something before I moved that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. However, perhaps he prefers to reply to my speech proposing that this question be dealt with by that committee.

As I said when I spoke in the debate on the inquiry introduced by Senator Deschatelets, I do not intend to take sides as between Ottawa, on the one hand, and the Attorney General of Quebec on the other, and, incidentally, the Attorney General of Ontario. I am having difficulty in deciding who, if anybody, is on the side of the angels in this matter. Everyone would agree that all the provinces of Canada must be treated fairly and with equal justice by the federal government. Everyone would also agree that the provinces have a constitutional right to have their own provincial police forces.

Ever since Confederation, Ontario and Quebec have exercised that right under the Constitution. They have maintained their own provincial police forces entirely at their own expense. They have received no financial compensation from Ottawa. Indeed, to my knowledge there is no record of their ever having asked for any up to now. On the other hand, I believe all other provinces have from the time of their joining Confederation relied on the RCMP to supply provincial police services.

Senator Perrault: That is not correct.

Senator Flynn: I thought that was the case, but if I am wrong I am prepared to stand corrected.

Senator Prowse: Actually, the Northwest Mounted Police were established to serve the Northwest Territories. When the provinces were formed they set up their own police forces, and these were disbanded in the depression.

Senator Perrault: In British Columbia, Senator Flynn, the provincial police force existed until the 1950s, at which time I believe it was found more satisfactory to accept the invitation of the federal government to have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police assume provincial policing responsibilities.

● (1540)

Senator Flynn: Then I do stand corrected. In any event, the correction does not vitiate my argument, because if the provinces thought it was preferable to have the RCMP supply police services, they must have had good reasons for so thinking—undoubtedly financial reasons. That is the point I wanted to make.

As Senator Manning mentioned, at the outset of their various agreements with Ottawa, the other provinces paid next to nothing for the services of the RCMP, while the taxpayers of Ontario and Quebec were, in effect, financing their own provincial police forces and subsidizing the services supplied by the federal police force to the other provinces, at whatever time that took place.

Over the years, the share paid by the provinces of the expense of having the federal police force supply provincial services has increased. In 1964 the cost-sharing formula that had been arrived at was 60-40, with the federal government paying the larger share. The arrangement also provided that between the years 1966 and 1976 the share paid by the federal government would diminish by 1 per cent per year, while that paid by the provincial governments would increase by 1 per cent per year. In other words, by 1976 the federal government would be paying 40 per cent of the costs while the provincial governments would be paying 60 per cent.

With policemen demanding higher salaries, equipment costing more to buy, and citizens clamouring for better protection, the Quebec and Ontario governments have finally decided they want a piece of the police-cost benefits available to the other provinces. They want financial compensation. They want a subsidy equal to that paid to the other provinces. And they want to maintain their own police forces.

I think it was Senator Deschatelets who said that this discussion between Ottawa, on the one part, and Ontario and Quebec, on the other, had started off rather badly. In fact, the debate has been very acrimonious. So much emotion and personality has been injected into the exchanges of opinion that the finer points of the arguments made by both sides have been obscured. I, for one, should like to hear for myself the arguments which the parties to this dispute have been making. To that end I have approached the Attorney General of Ontario, the Honourable John Clement, and the Minister of Justice of Quebec, the Honourable Jerome Choquette, both of whom have assured me that they would be quite interested in appearing before a committee of the Senate to explain their position for the benefit of senators.

Personally, I think we have a job to do here. In part, we were constituted to do this sort of thing—to see to it that provincial rights are protected. If these provinces have not a legal leg to stand on, then it may be that equity would dictate that the federal government's position and attitude ought to be different and ought to be changed or corrected. I hold no brief for either party in this matter, but I do want to get to the bottom of this question. I want to know if the various claims made by either side are justified.

For that reason, honourable senators, I move that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In doing so, I make my excuses to the chairman of that committee, which I know is rather busy. However, the committee should be able to find two or three days in which to hear the Attorney General of Canada, the Attorney General of Ontario and the Minister of Justice of Quebec. I look forward to that committee's report to the Senate, and will be interested in hearing its opinion on this matter.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn referred to the fact that I had adjourned the debate but had not pursued the matter. My reason for adjourning the debate was simply that I thought the matter was of sufficient importance that it should not be disposed of by this house until full debate had taken place. In other words, I was merely keeping the debate alive in order to allow senators, who would otherwise have missed the opportunity, to take part in it.

Incidentally, as the debate proceeded I discovered that its substance was more or less based on an exchange of correspondence between the responsible ministers. I felt, too, that we should go further into that aspect of the matter before concluding the debate. It does seem appropriate that we should get the facts directly from the Attorney General of Ontario and the Minister of Justice of Quebec, as well as from the Solicitor General of Canada and the various officials involved. In that respect I fully agree with Senator Flynn that the matter should be referred to committee. I should like to reserve the right to debate it further once we have the report of the committee.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

In addition, it is expected that a number of bills will be reported back to the Senate from the various committees, notably Bill S-5, Bill C-5, Bill S-19 and Bill C-32.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, could I draw to the attention of the deputy leader that for once the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is not sitting in the morning, but at 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

Senator Langlois: That is what I said.
Motion agreed to.

TELEVISION

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING MESSAGE—USE OF PICTURE OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on Thursday, February 20, a question was asked in the Senate by Senator Davey with respect to a commercial advertising message allegedly telecast for Guaranty Trust on television station CBLT at 7.10 p.m. on February 14.

Senator Davey asked three questions, the first being:

Did Guaranty Trust receive permission from the Government of Canada to use this picture of the Parliament Buildings in its advertising?

I am informed that Guaranty Trust did not receive permission from the Government of Canada to use the picture of the Parliament Buildings in the commercial described by Senator Davey.

Section 17(2)(c) of the Copyright Act provides that the publishing or photographing of any architectural work of art does not constitute an infringement of copyright. The Parliament Buildings are, I have been informed, an architectural work of art of the Italian Gothic style. As such, simply showing a picture of the Parliament Buildings would not ordinarily require that permission for such publishing or photographing be sought and given.

The second question was:

Is such permission needed?

The third question was:

If so, is such permission ever granted?

In answer to questions 2 and 3, let me advise honourable senators that the Speaker of the House of Commons and, I would think, the Speaker of the Senate, as representatives and spokesmen for their respective members, have in the past advised and directed those in the Press Gallery what use may be made of that part of the building over which the House of Commons and the Senate have control. For example, at one time television cameras, as honourable senators will recall, were allowed in the corridor opposite the House of Commons chamber. This no longer takes place and a room has been provided on the first floor for television interviews. It occurred as a result of a directive given by Mr. Speaker in the other place because he is charged with the control over the precincts on behalf of the members, and this, I am informed, will continue until the house orders otherwise.

Therefore, in summary, permission for showing the Parliament Buildings in regard to the commercial message sponsored by the Guaranty Trust Retirement Savings Plan is not, per se, restricted by the Speakers of the House of Commons and the Senate. However, I have no doubt that should a blatant commercial use be made of the premises of Parliament, it would constitute a contempt of Parliament.

Question 4 was:

Is permission needed from the Department of National Revenue for this kind of commercial approach and, if so, was such permission granted and why?

I am informed that the Guaranty Trust Company did not approach the Department of National Revenue regarding the filming of the commercial, and as far as can be ascertained there would be no legal requirement for them to do so.

Senator Davey's questions raise important issues about the use of government buildings, or what purport to be government buildings, in commercial messages.

I must say at this time that I am apologetic to Senator Davey for taking so long to secure the appropriate answers. This has been due to the fact that a considerable amount of research has been involved in several government departments.

Senator Flynn: Unsuccessful research.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES (INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS) ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. George C. van Roggen moved the second reading of Bill S-25, to amend the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it gives me particular pleasure to speak to the second reading of this very short bill. I wish to assure the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that although I refer to it as being a very short bill, I do not mean that I think of it as being an unimportant or simple bill.

Senator Flynn: You can tell that to Senator Laird.

Senator van Roggen: In fact, it is a most important bill. Honourable senators, I should like to take one or two minutes of your time in referring back to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, under the then chairmanship of Senator Aird, of July 1973, which was the report on Canadian relations with the European Community. If honourable senators will recall, that report recommended, among other things, three or four steps which should be pursued by Canada in its relationship with the developing European Community. One recommendation was that an interparliamentary group be established between this Parliament and the Parliament of the Common Market sitting at Strasbourg. That is now an established fact, as honourable senators are aware.

Another recommendation was that the Prime Minister of Canada should visit the capital of the Community at Brussels, as the capital of the Community and not just as the capital of Belgium. That, as honourable senators know, was done.

The third recommendation was that a comprehensive economic cooperation agreement be sought with the Community. In this connection, we have all seen in the press in recent weeks references to the progress which has been made following the Prime Minister's recent visits to Europe.

I might digress here for a moment to point out the distinction between a preferential trade agreement, which was not recommended in the Senate committee's report, and a comprehensive economic cooperation agreement, which was recommended and which has been sought by the government. I mention that because some areas of the media appeared to have difficulty in distinguishing between the two.

The fourth recommendation in that report was that the Economic Community be pressed to open an external office in Canada. That is what this bill is about.

To give honourable senators a little background on that particular point, I should say that the Community has accepted the accreditation of ambassadors to the Community from countries outside the Community, and Canada, among other nations, maintains an ambassador in Brussels accredited to the Community.

The converse, however, is not the case, and the Community, not being a sovereign state, does not have the ability to establish embassies abroad. It has, however, started down this path by establishing external offices in Washington and Tokyo.

While in Brussels with the committee, together with Senator Grosart and other senators, we pressed Community officials and our counterparts in the Parliament of the Community to consider a third office being established in Canada. Our reason for this was specific. As we pointed out to them, an office in Canada, in Ottawa, would enable them to receive a Canadian viewpoint on matters concerning North America, so that they would not make the mistake of assuming that the United States position was automatically the Canadian position. This would have been of great assistance to them in such matters as the Article 24(6) negotiations under GATT.

They at that time advised us that their plans were to open a third office probably in South America. However, continued pressure from members of our committee and subsequent interparliamentary groups, and the Prime Minister, has fortunately, certainly from our point of view, persuaded them that their third office in the world should be opened in Canada. In this the Senate, as a result of the work of its committee, can take great pride.

This bill, in its simplest terms, does nothing more than grant special recognition to the opening of that office in Canada so that the office will have the diplomatic privileges and immunities normally granted to an embassy being established in Canada. Because it is not an embassy, because it is an office of the European Community, a non-sovereign state, it requires special legislation to accord these privileges to it. The bill is purely technical in accomplishing this aim.

I will not go through the bill word for word, but if honourable senators have any questions I would be glad to endeavour to answer them. In view of the nature of the bill, I would submit that honourable senators may not wish to send it to committee. If that is your decision, I would propose to move that it be read a third time at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps I might say a few words, as seconder of the bill just introduced on second reading by Senator van Roggen. I agree with him, and we on this side agree, that it will not be necessary to send this bill to committee. Its purpose is clear, and we can see no matters in it that would require any further examination.

I am glad that Senator van Roggen, who was co-chairman of the joint committee of the two houses that had so much to do with persuading the European Communities to establish an external office in Canada, was the one who introduced this bill. We have recently been discussing the work done by senators, and I think this result of work done largely by senators is a good case in point.

The establishment of an external office by the European Communities in Canada was certainly achieved on the initiative of a Senate committee originally. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs went to Europe, and at that time we were told in no uncertain terms by the external commissioner of the Community that under no circumstances would there be any "special relationship" for Canada with the Communities. We discussed this with the officials. We discussed it with our opposite numbers in the Parliament of the Communities, and immediately got the sympathy and support of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Communities. This was followed up later when another delegation went over representing the Senate and House of Commons, and it was of that committee that Senator van Roggen was the chairman.

● (1420)

We raised the matter again. At first we had little hope that anything more than a mere information office would be opened in Canada, but before our few days of work were over we had the privilege of sitting in as guests of the Parliament of the Communities to hear the motion put forward on behalf of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Communities that such an office be established in Canada. I believe its official name is a "Delegation," for the reasons Senator van Roggen has given.

I mention this as an example of work done by senators, because personally I get tired at times of hearing the activities of these parliamentary delegations referred to as "trips" in the sense that they are pleasure trips. All of the senators and others who were on that committee will remember that we did not have even one hour to get out and look at the shops. We worked from morning until night for five days and then came home—all of us pretty tired from the activities but most happy with the success that had been achieved.

Senator van Roggen has mentioned that we are now the third country in the world to have this privilege and honour extended to us: first of all the United States in Washington, then Japan in Tokyo, and now ourselves. As Senator van Roggen pointed out, apparently the privilege was going elsewhere, but, and I have no hesitation in saying this, the discussions and arguments we put forward had a great deal to do with the fact that the Communities changed their minds and decided to establish their third office here in Canada.

Bill S-25 will now extend diplomatic privileges on the same basis as those extended to other international organizations of a similar nature. I commend the bill to honourable senators. It is one in which the Senate can take some pride because of its contribution to this great success for Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator van Roggen moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 20, the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill S-24, to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, when Senator Hays sponsored this bill he apologized for inflicting himself on the Senate twice in the same day. I make a similar apology now.

Senator McIlraith: You do not need to apologize for that.

Senator Flynn: It is not the first time you have done it yourself.

Senator Grosart: As the Leader of the Opposition says, it is not the first time I have done so, but I must remind him that I have always done so with apologies.

This must be "short-bill day" in the Senate, because the bill before us is surprisingly short. It may even be unique in that aspect since it consists of only one and one-third pages in the printed version.

Senator Flynn: It would have been a good bill for Senator Laird to introduce.

Senator Grosart: I am not saying it is a simple bill; it is a short bill. Senator Hays was also careful to make that distinction. As a matter of fact, it is not a simple bill in spite of its brevity, and it does raise some highly interesting questions.

If the bill itself is unique in certain respects, in other respects it may well also be historical owing to the fact that this may be the last occasion on which a bill to establish a bank will come to the Senate by way of petition for a special act under section 8 of the Bank Act. The reason for that is an expectation that there will be a new method available to banks, trust companies and other corporations and companies, to seek incorporation as federal companies.

Honourable senators will recall that in 1973 the Minister of Finance, speaking at the Western Economic Resources Conference, said that such a bill would be introduced. Since then it has been introduced in the other place as Bill C-7. It provides that, when the bill has received royal assent—which has not occurred yet, of course—a bank may be incorporated by letters patent on petition to the Governor General in Council, concurred in by the Minister of Finance. This would be achieved in Bill C-7 by an addition to section 8 of the Bank Act.

I have said that this Bill S-24 is unique. This is not merely a personal opinion. It is a statement made by the sponsor of the bill and certainly supported by the document that we have before us in support of the bill, entitled "The Proposal to Establish a new Canadian Bank, the National Commercial Bank of Canada."

I take it that the use of the phrase "proposal to establish a new Canadian bank" means more than to establish "another" Canadian bank. I take it that it means to establish a new kind of Canadian bank. This view is, I think, fully supported by the statements made by the sponsor and the documents supporting the bill in which it is called variously a "private bank," a "merchant bank," a "wholesale bank"—and Senator Molson raised a question, wondering what that meant—and "specifically a business oriented bank."

As I say, it is not my assessment that this is what the petition and the bill envision; it is the statement of the sponsors and the backers of the bill.

It is not my intention to discuss the details of the bill as such. This is a matter for the committee, of course, but I would like to make some suggestions which senators in the chamber may wish to consider and which I hope certainly would be considered in due course in committee.

My statement that this bill suggests a new kind of bank is fully supported, I think, by a statement that the intention of the backers of this bank is to introduce some "new blood" into the whole Canadian banking system—and that is the phrase used—new blood.

The supporting document reviews the history of Canadian banking, particularly in the last few years, and points out why the sponsors consider that new blood is needed in the banking system—new blood in a new kind of bank.

I will discuss immediately why I say this is a unique bill and why this is to be a new kind of bank. Senators would naturally ask how it is to be different from existing banks. The backers make it very clear how they see it as different. In the first place, they say it will not follow the traditional course of Canadian branch banking. At the present time there are something like 7,000 branches of the ten existing Canadian banks—the five major and the five others. The sponsors say they are not going that way, that this bank will have offices only in a few major cities. They justify that by saying that in their view the saturation point has been reached in Canada—a very interesting statement—in the extension of branches of banks. They produce some interesting figures. Their actual statement is that banking in Canada, which has been developed as an extensive branch system by the present chartered banks, may have developed to the saturation point.

● (1430)

In a table entitled, "Comparative United States and Canadian Banking Statistics Relating to Banking Offices," they point out some comparisons between the populations served by branch banks in Canada and the United States, and the assets per domestic banking office in Canada and the United States. The figures cover only the years 1962 to 1972, and I imagine the committee will want to have these figures updated as far as they can be. The population per banking office in Canada has actually declined from 1962 to 1972, in spite of substantial increases in the number of branch banks. In the United States the same thing has happened. The decrease in that decade in Canada has been from a population of 3,520 serving each branch bank to a population of 3,460. In the United States the decline has been larger, from a 6,947 population per branch bank to 5,446.

Interestingly enough, on the assets side, the Canadian picture for the decade shows some odd ups and downs. In 1962 the assets for a Canadian domestic branch were 7.76 million. In 1965 they were 9.49 M.M.; in 1966, 10.17 M.M.; in 1968, 12.48 M.M. In 1971 they dropped to 8.1 M.M., and in 1972 they were 9.72 M.M. In the United States, on the other hand, the assets increased greatly from 12.45 to 17.74 over those years.

It is on those comparisons, I presume, that the backers of this bill suggest that the traditional branch banking way is not the way that this new bank intends to go. They also say—and I think honourable senators will be interested in this—that as a result of their study and overview of the banking system in Canada the time may have come when the traditional low cost savings and demand deposits, which is what we normally call savings and chequing accounts in banks, may have reached the point where this is not low cost money any more. They relate this to the expense of new branches and other matters, and this is another reason why they seem to have doubts about the extension of the branch banking system.

I raise this as a matter that I am sure the committee will want to look at because the merits of the Canadian branch banking system have been hailed many times and held up often as the reason why our major Canadian banks have served the Canadian public so well, namely, because often there is a branch bank in the smallest communities.

Another unique feature of the projected operations of this bank is that it will specialize in the chemical industry, forest products, mining, agriculture, fishing, petroleum, transport, and substantially in sub-Arctic investment, presumably in petroleum.

A third unique feature, claimed by the backers of the bank, is that its assets will be privately and closely held. They make the statement that they do not think it will be necessary to go public; that is, that it will not be necessary to have their shares publicly traded anywhere. This, again, will be a unique feature which I am sure the committee will want to discuss.

The method by which they intend to avoid large-scale multiple public investment in their shares is by relying on investment from pension funds. They point out that pension funds in Canada today comprise something like $16 billion worth of assets, the savings of well over 2 million Canadians. It is in this connection that they have used the phrase that this will give the new bank "the strength of backing that it needs." We have the statement that some 25 corporate entities in Canada will be the initial subscribers to the bank, subscribing some $22 million of the $40 million capitalization of the bank.

The sponsor made the statement that the authorized capital will be $40 million: 4 million shares at a par value of $10, of which $22 million, or 2 million shares, at a price of $11, has been subscribed. I am sure the committee will want to examine that statement, because I wonder if it has been subscribed. I wonder if it is the intention to have these original subscribers pay up the whole $22 million, or will they be paying part of it and be subject to call for the rest? It will be interesting to know if this amount has been subscribed already. I rather doubt that it has, because the sources are pension funds and it would be difficult to see how, under the existing laws protecting pensions, they could actually subscribe to the bank before it has been incorporated. However, we have to accept the statement that that is the intention. I have been told they have letters of intent, but it would seem to me that the statement made by the sponsor, and which is repeated in the capitalization chart appearing in the supporting document, to the effect that these amounts have actually been subscribed, might be a little extravagant.

A fourth unique feature of this bank is that it will avowedly engage in what it calls "risk" financing. It intends, apparently, to go fairly heavily into venture capital; that is, bridge financing, construction financing, and so on—all areas which are high risk, and which are very often regarded as the type of investments about which banks and trust companies should be careful before investing very heavily in.

I must compliment the backers and the sponsor of the bill on their courage in saying that this is the kind of bank they are going to run. However, I think they may also run into difficulties—if not here, perhaps in the other place—on this assumption that it is going to be a business-oriented bank, and not give the service that Canadians generally expect from the neighbourhood bank.

The name, it seems to me, is going to cause some problems. In English it is the National Commercial Bank of Canada. The word "National" is used by another bank, and the word "Commercial" in the same sense is used by another bank also. In French it is, «La Banque Nationale de Commerce du Canada», which certainly has some echoes of the name of at least two other banks, and I would not be surprised if some who may be concerned will be before the committee to ask whether this name should be granted.

The sponsors and backers of this bank, it seems to me, are beyond question. They are businessmen who have had many major successes in the area of intermediary financing including such corporations as MIC, the Mortgage Insurance Corporation of Canada, which last year alone secured mortgages amounting to about $2 billion. Then there is Markborough, a well-known financial intermediary, and a trust company, the Morguard Trust Company, which has been a principal agent in the whole field of mortgage financing, and so on. The head office is to be in Vancouver, and this surprises me in view of the fact that the major sponsors, Boyd, Stott & McDonald, are not centred in Vancouver. Mind you, I cannot think of a more pleasant place to have a head office of a bank than in Vancouver, and no doubt the sponsor will explain why, when the principals are located in Toronto, they will find it easier to do business by having their head office 2,000 miles away in beautiful British Columbia.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on this point. I want to make it clear that I am no way criticizing the presentation. There certainly are some problems, one of which has already been raised in this Parliament. Here I am referring to the propriety of pension funds of crown corporations being invested in a new bank. Obviously the government has an interest in protecting these pension funds as they have in protecting all pension funds. There is a statutory limit of 4 per cent, but the matter has been raised and the question has been asked if the government has instructed these crown corporations to consult with the government before investing in such ventures as this. I use the word "ventures" because that is one of the words that they used. I am not suggesting that all the capital is going into ventures, but it is a new kind of bank and one has to recall that the record of all the new banks that we have authorized here has not been too happy. I can think of one whose stocks went on the market at $11 and are now worth $4. This is the kind of thing that might give some concern to the government when considering the question of investment of pension funds of crown corporations.

Again, honourable senators, I am not in any way attempting to say that such pension funds should not be invested in this company. That is not my intention at all. I am simply raising the question because it is an important one and has already been raised in Parliament.

Debate continued later this day.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. In fact, I should like to make a motion of privilege, under rule 33 of our rules, concerning the Minutes of the Proceedings of yesterday's session.

Senator Everett: Before the honourable senator rises on his question of privilege, I wish to state that I intended to continue the debate on the bill under discussion, Bill S-24, and I wonder if the honourable senator could wait until I have finished speaking.

Senator Greene: I rise pursuant to rule 33 which provides that a motion calling upon the Senate to take action may be moved without notice, and in such a situation all other proceedings shall be set aside.

Yesterday's Minutes of the Proceedings failed to record a motion I made pointing out that the proposal made by Senator Godfrey was out of order in that it affected the balance of national accounts.

I think this an extremely important issue in that if I understood Your Honour's ruling correctly, it was that inasmuch as Senator Godfrey did not propose a bill but merely involved a regulation under a statute it did not violate rule 62 which prescribes that we may not present a bill in this house which affects the balance of national accounts unless there is a recommendation from the Governor in Council. Your Honour's ruling is tantamount to finding that we can do indirectly by regulation that which we cannot do directly by introducing a bill, and it is an extremely important precedent.

I respectfully submit to Your Honour that it is very important, not only from that standpoint but from the standpoint that we in this house should jealously guard the prerogatives that belong exclusively to the Governor in Council, and we would be remiss in our duties if we did not bring it to Your Honour's attention when a matter in this house violates the rules of parliamentary government.

Therefore, I respectfully move, on a question of privilege, that this motion and Your Honour's ruling thereon should have been included in the Minutes of the Proceedings for yesterday.

The Hon. the Speaker: I shall look into the question raised by the honourable senator and I shall report later.

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Hays for second reading of Bill S-24, to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I am not the sponsor of this bill, but I do have some things to say in respect to it, especially so in the light of the remarks Senator Grosart has made.

This bill is to incorporate a bank to be named the National Commercial Bank of Canada with an authorized capital of $40 million, and a subscribed capital of $22 million. It is to have its head office in Vancouver, and Senator Grosart has raised the point that it will not get its deposits by the normal banking method; that is, through the formation of a branch banking system. He has stated that what we are dealing with here is a new type of bank, which the sponsor said is based on the fact that the branch banking system in Canada is saturated. It is true that the sponsors did refer to this fact in the submission deposited with us, but I think the problem that they foresee is this: if a new bank in Canada establishes the number of branches that are required properly to service the Canadian public in the fashion of the five major banks, they would find that at today's real estate and building costs, the cost of their deposits would indeed be extremely high.

What this bank sees is the fact that term deposits are a growing factor in today's banking, and that they can achieve the deposit targets they have by going after term deposits rather than building a large branch banking system which would duplicate what already exists in Canada.

They will, of course, have branches, and those branches will be in the main commercial centres in all provinces of Canada. Indeed, as Senator Grosart mentioned, their lending policy will be different from that of the normal commercial bank. They do propose to lend largely to businesses, mostly small businesses, and they also propose to be involved in resource financing, in real estate financing and in term loans. They also propose to have a sort of merchant banking aspect in that they will be interested in venture capital, and in bringing small businesses in Canada into what I would refer to as the "big time."

The question then is not so much one of what they are doing, because what they are really saying is "We can get our money through term deposits. There is a market that presently is not being fully serviced, and we can provide the special expertise that will serve that market." It seems to me that the question facing Parliament is whether the sponsors of this proposed new bank can make a success of it, and we might well consider who they are. Are they people who can do the job that is set out? Are they people of substance? Are they people who will fail at the task?

The sponsors of this bank are Boyd, Stott and McDonald who, as Senator Grosart has said, form a firm which has had some considerable experience in the financial world in Canada and some considerable successes. At the present time they own 80 per cent of Morguard Trust, which has $600 million of mortgages under administration; 50 per cent of Westguard Holdings, which in turn owns 54 per cent of Westmount Life and which it bought back from, I gather, foreign interests, and a number of other corporations which come under the Boyd, Stott banner.

The shareholders of Boyd, Stott are Michael Boyd, the president, and W. H. McDonald, the vice-president. They each own 15.7 per cent of Boyd, Stott. 8.1 per cent is owned by three officers of the Morguard Trust, which is a subsidiary of Boyd, Stott. Edper Investments, which is a company owned by a trust set up by Mr. Allan Bronfman, owns 12.4 per cent.

It is interesting to note that the directors of Edper Investments are Edward and Peter Bronfman; Mr. Jacques Courtois, who is the vice-president of the Bank of Nova Scotia; and our former colleague, the Honourable Lazarus Phillips. The Air Canada Pension Fund owns 11.1 per cent, and the Canadian National Pension Fund owns 11.1 per cent. Time Incorporated of the United States, through the Lumbermen's Investment Corporation, owns 10 per cent; Duke Seabridge Limited, which is a company owned by the Guinness family of England, owns 9.6 per cent; Houston Willoughby, investment dealers of Regina, owns 4.1 per cent; and the Aluminum Company of Canada owns 1.6 per cent.

The shareholders of the bank will be financial institutions. It is proposed that they will be largely composed of Canadian pension funds and, indeed, because of their financial strength it will not be necessary to establish a market on these shares; these people will be in for the long pull. That is the reason why it is not necessary for these shares at this juncture to be publicly traded.

The provisional directors are Mr. John T. DesBrisay, senior partner of Cassels, Brock, a large Toronto law firm; Mr. Howard Eaton, former executive vice-president of the Bank of British Columbia; Mr. Albert Hudon, the president of Miron Company, which is a subsidiary of Gemstar; Mr. W. H. McDonald, the president of Boyd, Stott and McDonald; Mr. W. E. Scott, former Inspector General of Banks; and Mr. Graham Walker, the president of Houston, Willoughby and Company.

Honourable senators, I have just gone through a fair degree of name dropping, but I did it on purpose, because Senator Grosart raised some very interesting questions. Those questions will have to be answered. However, what we want to know first, as I said before, is whether we are dealing here with substantial people, people who can meet these questions and, if they answer them to the satisfaction of the committee, can produce what they say they will produce. I suggest that the names I have given you indicate that these are substantial people who have a long financial background. If they are proposing to start a new bank, then it is very likely that they will be successful, if they are granted the necessary approval.

Therefore, I hope that as soon as possible, in order that the questions raised by Senator Grosart and others—indeed, I have some questions myself—can be satisfactorily answered, the Senate will act to refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which, after the appropriate notice, can commence its hearings on the subject of this application.

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, we on this side were prepared to conclude the debate on second reading today. However, because the sponsor is not here today, I will adjourn the debate. I understand that a few senators on this side have questions to ask of the sponsor.

On motion of Senator Choquette, debate adjourned.

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC PROVINCIAL POLICE

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONSIDER FINANCIAL COMPENSATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Flynn that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider the question of financial compensation by the federal government for the maintenance, by the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, of their own police forces.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I feel it perhaps appropriate at this time to make a statement on behalf of the government with respect to the motion of Senator Flynn regarding the financial compensation by the federal government for the maintenance of police forces of Ontario and Quebec. Admittedly, there is an ever-increasing cost of maintaining the various police forces in Canada.

Several points have been raised with respect to claims for compensation for the maintenance of police forces by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. First of all, there are benefits of an administrative, operational and financial nature in using one police force, which certainly exists—the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Those benefits, of course, are now enjoyed by provinces other than Ontario and Quebec. It is felt that there is a greater efficiency and economy resulting from one command structure serving the police demands in a contract province which are of value to that province. Provinces which accept a single force, that is, the RCMP, eliminate the problems of overlapping of jurisdiction which occur where provincial and federal forces operate independently. It is also felt that the existence of many police units under the control of the RCMP commissioner makes it possible to reduce temporarily the strength of all or any of those units so as to quickly make available a body of fully trained personnel to meet any federal, provincial or municipal emergencies, as they may arise. Greater efficiency and economy are also obtained in recruiting, training, equipping and staffing. The size and scope of the force provide further career opportunities, greater potential for advancement and allow for specialization not available in smaller police forces.

The foregoing are advantages to the contracting provinces, and the nation as a whole, of the system whereby the vast majority of provinces enter into a contract arrangement with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for provincial police servicing.

● (1500)

Those in support of the claim of financial assistance for certain provincial police forces have perhaps restricted their consideration to the tangible, direct cost of maintaining and administering federal law enforcement resources in the contracting provinces. They have perhaps chosen to ignore the intangible benefits that accrue to the federal government under these arrangements.

While supporters of the provincial positions conclude there is a federal subsidy flowing to the contracting provinces, which is not available to other provinces such as Ontario and Quebec, perhaps it would be more proper to say that the contracting provinces derive financial benefits as a fair result of economies of scale that result from the aforementioned one-police-force arrangements.

It should be pointed out that the amounts to be passed on to the contracting provinces with regard to the intangible benefits accruing to either the federal or provincial governments at any given time are not easy to assess, and are matters for negotiation by contract.

From time to time, and especially in discussions held in 1960, 1964 and 1966, negotiations took place between the federal government and contracting provinces for federal police services. At those conferences, and in later negotiations with regard to one contracting province in 1967, a formula which more properly reflected an equitable cost-sharing arrangement was agreed to by the federal and provincial governments.

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government allow an interruption? May I ask if he is speaking to Order No. 5 or Order No. 7? Order No. 5 is a motion to refer the matter to committee.

Senator Perrault: I assure the honourable senator that I am speaking to Order No. 5; about the possibility of pursuing this further by reference to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. In my opinion, the question could properly be pursued under Order No. 5 or Order No. 7.

At these conferences in 1960, 1964 and 1966, and in later negotiations with regard to one contracting province in 1967, to which I referred, the matter of how there could be a more equitable and fair sharing of costs between the federal and provincial governments was discussed. One of the speakers in this debate has pointed out accurately that there is a move toward having the provincial governments assume a higher percentage of these costs.

It should also be pointed out that opportunities were afforded all of the provinces at the 1960, 1964 and 1966 conferences, including Ontario and Quebec, to be present and to set forth their views. At those meetings there were two points of view as to who would benefit under the new formula. In the light of those conflicting viewpoints, certain provinces undertook neither to contract for RCMP services under the 1966 formula nor to assert that contracting provinces should support a greater share of costs.

Presumably, the reason that neither course was chosen was consistent, in their view, with their best interests as viewed by their governments. But surely it may be said that it is not the right of provincial governments at the present time to claim that they should be compensated for financial loss which they have allegedly suffered as a result of not being a party to these arrangements, and not having taken advantage of the opportunities offered to them at those previous meetings.

Finally, it should be noted that while certain provinces did not take advantage of the 1960, 1964, 1966 and 1967 agreements, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police makes an important, and often vital, contribution to the administration of criminal law in all provinces of Canada, including Ontario and Quebec.

Let me give honourable senators one example. In Quebec, "C" Division of the RCMP has its headquarters situated in Montreal. It consists of two subdivisions with a total strength of more than 1,200 persons. In Quebec, the RCMP is not only responsible for the administration of federal laws, such as those dealing with narcotics, customs and excise, income tax, aeronautics and security; it also collaborates in a very close manner with the Quebec Provincial Police and various municipal police forces, including, of course, that of the Montreal Urban Community, especially in the sphere of commercial fraud and organized crime—two tasks for which the RCMP has established specialized squads.

It should be pointed out that these service costs are borne entirely by federal authorities without any provincial contribution of any kind. Therefore, it is simply not accurate to say there is no federal help at all in the matter of maintaining law and order in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. There are similar instances in the province of Ontario. I do not wish to single out the province of Quebec as an example.

On a positive closing note, the federal government welcomes an examination, in concert with the Government of Quebec, of its role in general, and that of the RCMP in particular, in Canadian criminal law enforcement. Recently a joint study group of the federal and Ontario governments examined and described police activities undertaken by the RCMP in the province of Ontario, and inquiries are continuing in this regard. The Solicitor General of Canada has welcomed the formation of a similar study group with the province of Quebec to further clarify respective roles in criminal enforcement in Canada.

This may properly be said to be a positive note—negotiations, consultations and discussions are continuing. There is a determination on the part of the federal government to ensure that all provinces are treated fairly and equitably, and given equal opportunity and equal access to federal government programs. In this day of law enforcement, I am sure all honourable senators will agree that this is a vital area of activity, particularly at a time when there are increasing problems concerning crime and law and order throughout the country.

Before resuming my seat, may I say that I welcome the suggestion of Senator Flynn that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in order that that committee might consider the entire question. That is certainly in the spirit of the consultations and discussions which have been continuing over these many weeks and months.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government when we might expect this reference to be made, in view of the fact that the debate on the substance of this motion is still continuing under Order No. 7?

Senator Perrault: I can only suggest that with the assent of the honourable senator who initiated the inquiry, Senator Deschatelets, the reference to that committee could be expedited. I know that all honourable senators would like to have this matter discussed at the earliest opportunity.

Senator Choquette: It is the same problem.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, I would like to raise a point in connection with this item on the Order Paper. It will be noted that the motion of Senator Flynn is:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to consider the question of financial compensation by the federal government for the maintenance, by the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, of their own police forces.

In other words, his reference is very narrow and presupposes payment by the federal authority to the provinces for services they provide through the provincial police forces for work that is exclusively within the area of their own provincial constitutional responsibility. He does not embody in the motion the larger question of delineating the areas of coordination and cooperation by the various police forces in matters that lie within the federal and provincial fields of constitutional responsibility—a question that must concern all honourable senators who think about the problems facing police forces at this time.

There is one other point of concern regarding this motion. I must say, frankly, that I would oppose any payment by the federal authority to a provincial government for the maintenance of a provincial police force to do police work that lies exclusively within the jurisdiction of the province. I have no preconceived idea as to the propriety or otherwise of helping the provinces finance costly programs lying wholly within the area of provincial jurisdiction but we are here considering a narrower point.

I recall discussing this very thoroughly at the time one of the first contracts was being entered into with the provinces for contracting these services, and I had considerable discussion with the Minister of Justice of the day on that subject. The point we were discussing ought, I think, to be brought to the attention of the house today. It concerned the dangers inherent in creating a national police force.

Whatever interest I have taken throughout my life in public affairs has been impelled by, I hope, a liberal approach to the rights of the individual. I, for one, do not wish to see a national police force doing all police work in this country, or indeed in any country. My reason for saying that is quite simple. By the very nature of the work required of police forces, they must be given arbitrary power, and they are given arbitrary power by the statutes governing their operations, which is right and proper. However, where arbitrary power is given to a vast number of persons to exercise from day to day, there must be constant checks and balances to prevent the abuse of that arbitrary power. Fortunately, in this country we have, in spite of occasional discouragements about federal-provincial relations, a division of responsibility that does provide a check. In addition, we have the situation where the national police force, the RCMP, is doing police work in the area of matters coming under federal jurisdiction. In eight of the ten provinces, containing about one-third of Canada's population, the provincial area of responsibility is covered by the federal police force; in the other two provinces, containing two-thirds of the population, it is done by the two provincial police forces, and that is a very good balance. I think it is desirable to have such a distribution of the police work between the various forces.

I regret that when the subject is examined in committee it will be on the narrow point put forward in this motion, because there are many matters concerning the policing of the country, and the various provinces, in this day and age—the interrelationship of the forces, the common training of police and matters of that kind—which might properly be examined.

I do want to point out the dangers in the federal government's starting to contribute directly to the maintenance of provincial police forces because, if that got well under way, sooner or later those paying the shot would demand more control and authority over them. When that control and authority over them is demanded, we are in fact in the position of having one national police force for the whole country, having responsibility in both federal and provincial matters, and that I deplore.

I think no one can accuse me of being other than a very strong supporter of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. My remarks today in no way reduce the strength of my support for it, which I have asserted strongly for a considerable number of years. However, I hope my remarks will contribute something to the consideration to be given to this subject matter by honourable senators.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps I might point out that Senator McIlraith's concern about narrowing the scope of the discussion, which he feels is inherent in the wording of Senator Flynn's motion, has been adequately answered, first, by Senator Perrault and, secondly, by Senator McIlraith himself. Both of those senators, in speaking to the motion in these so-called narrow terms, have ranged over the whole topic, and over almost everything the committee itself would wish to consider. I do not think Senator McIlraith need worry at all that if this matter is referred to committee, as the Leader of the Government suggests, there will be any problem about ranging over the whole area that both he and Senator Perrault have found it possible to range over in their discussion of this motion, which is Order No. 5 and not Order No. 7.

Senator Lamontagne: May I ask a question of Senator McIlraith? I noted that he was very much opposed to a national police force.

Senator McIlraith: To all the police work in the country being done by one national police force.

Senator Lamontagne: I share his concern in that respect. I wish to ask him whether he is opposed to the present arrangements whereby local and provincial police force work is being done by the federal force, which amounts to the creation of a national police force for at least eight provinces.

Senator McIlraith: I find no inconsistency in supporting that at all. I have given a lot of time and thought to, and have worked with the provinces on, renewing contracts from time to time. To keep the national police force at its peak level you require a wider base than simply the administration of the law contained in certain federal statutes, such as the Immigration Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Customs Act. Secondly, the eight smaller provinces simply do not have the base for training a proper police force, and there is nothing worse than giving arbitrary authority to an ill-trained police force. They do not have the facilities for training, and there is no way some of the smaller provinces can easily be given those facilities. These provinces have neither the quality nor volume of work to maintain a force at a high state of efficiency, and they do far better contracting for police services. In my view, it works in a very satisfactory way for a province which cannot provide adequate quality police work for itself from its own resources, and which would be more expensive than contracting for the RCMP services.

I find no inconsistency at all in that. It must be remembered that those eight provinces contain roughly only one-third of the population of the country.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I draw the attention of the house to the fact that, if this matter is referred to committee as proposed in this motion, it will be important for the committee to keep in mind that the concerns of Ontario and Quebec over this matter—the two provinces that have their own police forces—cannot be divorced from the concerns of the other provinces which, over the years, have entered into these agreements with the RCMP.

The federal government's policy in this matter has been consistent for at least 40 years. I recall that Alberta originally had its own police force, which was disbanded when the province entered into an agreement with the Government of Canada for the use of the RCMP for provincial police services. As a matter of fact, that was done just shortly prior to the time that I became associated with the Government of Alberta. In 1935 and 1936, when my party assumed the responsibility of the government in the province, there was quite strong public opinion favouring the concept of a provincial police force. The change had been made just shortly before, and there were still feelings of sentiment and emotion involved.

At that time we did examine with the federal government the basis of this arrangement, because we had to decide whether we should re-establish the provincial police force or continue with the arrangement just undertaken with the federal government. As far back as that time, the position of the federal government was that any province which felt it was an advantage to use the RCMP as the provincial law enforcement body had that option. But the federal government was not prepared to consider anything along the lines of a subsidy to finance provincial police forces, if it was the desire of provinces to establish or maintain such forces.

I forget the exact number of provinces which, over the years, have disbanded their police forces and gone to the RCMP. I know that British Columbia is one. But the point I make is that those decisions were made by the provinces on the clear understanding that there was no financial assistance available to them from the federal treasury for the maintenance of their own police forces. If they wanted to avail themselves of an economic, financial or other advantage, the only course open to the provinces was to disband their police forces and make a contract with the federal government for RCMP services. In view of the fact that over these years a number of provinces have made that decision, honourable senators will agree that if that policy were changed now, or if financial assistance is offered the two provinces who happen to have retained their own police forces, a serious expression of concern would be invited from a number of the other provinces.

They could quite rightly say that had they known that such an arrangement could be made, under which they could receive federal subsidies for provincial police forces, they would have retained their police forces because, for whatever reason, they preferred a provincial force to the federal force.

I suggest that it would be unfortunate, in the light of the history of this whole question, if that were to happen, and I speak as one who participated in the three conferences which the Leader of the Government referred to as taking place in 1966.

There has not been a change in the federal position in all those years. Perhaps it would be worthwhile to have the matter discussed in committee—I would not object to that—but it would be unwise for the committee to approach the matter thinking there is some real ground for financial assistance to those two provinces in respect of their police forces, and thinking that that issue can be divorced from the wider national issue which would immediately be raised by the other provinces. It is almost certain that they would assert that had that option been open to them they would have preferred it to disbanding their own police forces in favour of the federal force. The fact is that they were told that option was not available to them.

I appreciate the point raised by Senator McIlraith about the dangers inherent in one national police force. I must say, however, that under the existing arrangement in Canada that danger is minimal. In the first place, the nature of these agreements is such that the personnel of the RCMP who carry out police work in the various provinces are assigned to that specific duty, and are under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of the particular province. Although they are members of the national force, they are not under one central command, which I think was the crux of the concern expressed by Senator McIlraith. Indeed, control of the force has really been decentralized by virtue of the fact that the personnel are answerable to the attorney general of the particular province contracting with the RCMP.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, before Senator Manning leaves that point, I wonder if he recalls the controversy which arose in Newfoundland over the question of sending in RCMP reinforcements at a time when there were some rather serious labour problems in that province.

Senator Manning: As I recall that incident, honourable senators, it arose out of a request by the Government of Newfoundland for additional men to help control a situation in St. John's. Under the agreement with which I am familiar—and I assume they are pretty much the same for all provinces which are parties to them—a specific number of RCMP personnel are assigned to a province. There is provision for the provincial attorney general to request additional personnel if they are needed, but the agreement, in my judgment at least, makes it quite clear that the decision as to whether that request will be acceded to rests with the Minister of Justice of Canada, and not with the provincial attorney general. I believe that was the basis for the controversy in Newfoundland. The government of that province took the position that they had a right to those men if they thought they needed them, but I think there is no doubt that those were men in addition to the personnel covered by the contract.

In all my years of association with this type of agreement in Alberta, I have never known of a case of interference of any kind by the federal government authorities or the federal RCMP authorities with the control of the province. The province has complete control over the personnel assigned to it under the contract. Of course, the number of personnel may vary from year to year, because the province may requisition additional men if they are needed, but no problem has ever arisen in that respect.

Another factor that offsets the possible dangers inherent in one national police force is the existence of large municipal police forces in the metropolitan centres of the country. All of the metropolitan centres have their own police forces, and if you consider the combined populations of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, to name the three largest, you must realize that there are more people under the jurisdiction of those municipal police forces than there are in many of the provinces. So we have that added check by virtue of the large police forces in our metropolitan centres.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, if I may allude to the point raised by Senator McIlraith respecting the Newfoundland controversy, my understanding of the situation there is that in cases of emergency the agreement provided that the attorney general of the province could make a request to the federal government through the Commissioner of the RCMP in Ottawa. If the commissioner approved that request, he then passed it on to the Attorney General of Canada with his recommendation. In the case of the Newfoundland controversy, the commissioner resigned because his request and recommendation were not accepted.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, would it not be more correct to say that the dispute between Ottawa and Newfoundland at that time was over the propriety of using the RCMP to break a strike? Surely it was not a question of either adding to or reducing the contingent of RCMP already there.

Senator McIlraith: It was actually a question of which attorney general had the authority to decide the matter.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC PROVINCIAL POLICE

FINANCIAL COMPENSATION FOR MAINTENANCE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the claim made by the Minister of Justice of the Province of Quebec for financial compensation from the federal government with respect to the Quebec Provincial Police Force and to the ever-increasing costs of maintaining the various police forces in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, in speaking in support of Senator Flynn's motion yesterday I made it quite clear that it was not my intention to pursue further the debate on Senator Deschatelets' inquiry at that stage, reserving my right, of course, to speak to the subject-matter when it has been reported back to the house by the standing committee.

As no other honourable senator at that time rose to voice his interest in continuing this debate, I respectfully suggest that this item be dropped from the Orders of the Day.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 27, at 8 p.m.

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson came to the Senate in 1953. Last Monday, May 26, was her birthday, and the law has provided and time has decreed that she retire on that day from the Senate, which she has done. She left with honour and dignity, having served Canada in war and peace and having been appointed the first woman Speaker in either house of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Croll: In her lifetime she influenced politics and policy, played a creative and decisive role as an ardent advocate of women's rights long before women's lib was ever heard of. During her lifetime she witnessed the greatest changes in world history—from the buggy to the moon.

She changed her outlook to fit the times without ever abandoning her principles. She felt at home in both worlds, and contributed to both. Her main contributions were to the humanities—social welfare, the aged, the poor and needy. These contributions are written in the pages of Canadian history.

To say farewell to Muriel is not easy. As she now reaches the evening she will see how splendid the day has been. To each of us is given an opportunity to make a contribution. She made hers by doing ordinary things extraordinarily well.

So, goodbye and good luck to a valued friend, a great lady and an outstanding public servant.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I wish to join in paying a tribute to a much loved and greatly respected colleague, Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson, P.C., Q.C. On her retirement this chamber is losing one of its most active, hard-working and conscientious members. She has always accepted with grace and dignity the responsibilities that come to one as a member of the Senate and she has always been willing to do more than her share of those duties. Senator Fergusson has epitomized the ideal Canadian woman and all that is best in womanhood. She has engaged in and sponsored many organizations and movements which contribute to the welfare of others. She has always given freely of her time and means to promote the well-being of those who are not so fortunate as many of us. Her horizons are wide and deep, but she never allows the scene of these horizons to dim her view of the closer needs. Her views and assistance are often sought and she gives of both generously whenever and wherever required.

Senator Fergusson brought to this chamber an excellent knowledge of the many problems which face us as a nation and by her speeches on a great variety of topics she has brought this knowledge before this chamber. I am sure every senator is proud of Muriel for all the many achievements that she has accomplished since coming to the Senate and even earlier. We were particularly proud of her when she was appointed Speaker of the Senate, the first woman to be named to this high position, the fourth highest position in Canada according to precedence. She was honoured again by her appointment to the Privy Council and almost at the same time the designation of Queen's Counsel was conferred on her, both honours well deserved.

It is a pleasure for me to pay tribute to Muriel today, as she has been a close and wonderful friend of mine for almost twenty years. We have been desk mates in this chamber and our rooms were side by side during those years until she became Speaker, so you can understand the bond of friendship that has been forged. I considered it a great privilege to be associated with her as one of her colleagues and closest friends.

Senator Fergusson has retired from the Senate, but we will look forward to seeing her come back to visit us often and perhaps give us some good advice from her experiences. She will always be very welcome. We wish her health, happiness and the best of all things in life in the years that lie ahead.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I presume that Hon. Senator Fergusson, because of her great humility and the great discretion she has always shown in the carrying out of her duties, would certainly not like us to add to the avalanche of praise which has kept falling upon her ever since she announced her decision to retire from the Senate.

However, I join with my honourable colleagues, in telling her tonight how much we are going to miss her and how we regret her decision to leave us, while paying tribute for her outstanding contribution to this house and to Canada.

However, I must correct a slight error which was made quite inadvertently, I am sure, by my honourable colleague, Senator Croll, when he mentioned a few minutes ago that she was required by law to leave. It is of her own volition that Senator Fergusson has decided to leave this house since, although she has passed the age of retirement prescribed by statute for senators appointed after 1965, she could have remained for the rest of her life a member of this august Chamber. Thus, it is by choice that she decided to leave us because with her sense of duty, her dedication to the affairs of the country, she has thought for a moment that her age, although she has been very active in the Senate, could prevent her from rendering the services the country is entitled to expect from her, according to her own estimation. That is why we regret to see her leaving in such circumstances, when she still could very well serve this country and this house.

I will conclude my remarks by saying this: the Senate has grown richer with her contributions to its work, in the course of the many years she has been with us. Our best wishes go with her, coupled with our regret at seeing her leaving, and we hope we will have the pleasure of welcoming her in our midst on many occasions in the future.

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, it was once claimed by a disrespectful but humorous critic of this place—there are many critics, but not all are humorous—that the average Canadian senator possessed all the virtues one could hope to find in a human being—all, that is, except one—resignation.

Well, it appears that Senator Fergusson did not lack even that quality. Last Friday she resigned her seat in this chamber, thus bringing to an end an impressive parliamentary career which lasted 22 years.

Despite the extraordinary personal success she enjoyed throughout her career, she remained ever humble, approachable, warm and friendly. Busy as she was, there was always time for that person or organization needing advice or encouragement.

In the latter part of her career she was permitted to play an even greater role in the affairs of our country. As Speaker of the Senate, she presided over our deliberations with consummate efficiency and fairness. She was never satisfied with anything less than an outstanding effort.

She is a native daughter of whom New Brunswick can be justly proud. She has brought inestimable credit to her country, her sex and to herself.

Senator Fergusson worked—as I am sure she will continue to work—tirelessly in the defence of women's rights and the pursuit of a multiplicity of commendable humanitarian goals.

We on this side are pleased to have had the privilege of being associated with her. She is a truly fine human being, and we wish her a very happy and fruitful retirement.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I should like to add a personal note: having known Muriel Fergusson during the war when she was an attorney for the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, a position which I myself held in Quebec City, I consider her departure as that of a friend. I recognize her in what she has done because, as a member of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution, she held the view that senators should retire not at 75 but at 70 years of age. She thought it logical, having stood for that principle, to do what she has just done.

I am sure that I speak on behalf of all honourable senators in wishing her many more happy years in the service of our country, of Canadian women and Canadians generally.

[English]

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, my association with Senator Fergusson goes back as far as that of any member of this chamber, although that of only the last three years was within the precincts of the Senate. Our alma mater is Mount Allison University. We graduated at different times, but we did meet on college business and at college functions. In many cases her friends and acquaintances were also mine, and we kept in touch in small ways.

On my appointment to the Senate, her kindness and solicitude were precious to me. I always felt that she was ready to lend a helping hand when I needed one, and she often did so even before I realized I needed one.

She stands high in my estimation. Her contribution to the cause of women's rights has been great, and we can look upon her work with pride and great satisfaction.

Honourable senators, we can always say of Muriel Fergusson, "There goes a real woman for Canadians to honour."

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, the dean of New Brunswick senators, Senator Burchill, is not here this evening, so I shall try, in my poor way, to stand in for him.

I have known Muriel McQueen Fergusson for many years. Throughout her lifetime, she has been a lady of "firsts." She was one of the first women in New Brunswick to become a barrister, and she performed her duties as such in a most honourable fashion. She served Canada as counsel to the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, and later was one of the first women to become a senior civil servant in New Brunswick when she was appointed Director of Family Allowance and Old Age Security. I might add, she had a fair amount of competition from a number of males for that position.

She was elected a member of the city council of Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick and her home town, and became deputy mayor—another first. She became a Queen's Counsel and a Privy Councillor. As has been said, she was the first lady Speaker of either house of this Parliament.

It has been a lifetime career of firsts for Muriel Fergusson. She was always first when there was a cause to be fought, or when there were people to be helped.

She was robbed early in life of her husband and the opportunity to have a family. Instead, she took to herself the disenfranchised, the poor, and those who had no champion. Over the years, she has built in New Brunswick, and beyond New Brunswick, an immense family; and her family in New Brunswick regards her with great pride.

The Senate is losing her, but we in New Brunswick are gaining by her return to Fredericton. I am sure she will start yet another career in her retirement years as the champion of those who need a champion—the poor, the disenfranchised. Fredericton itself, as well as the province of New Brunswick, which have already benefited greatly from her enterprise and activities, will continue to benefit in the years ahead.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report of the committee:

Tuesday, May 27, 1975

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code" has in obedience to the order of reference of December 20th, 1974, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 1: Strike out lines 10 to 12 inclusive and substitute therefor the following:

"2. Subsections 35(2) and (3) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) If, pursuant to subsection (1), the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted, but, if the court finds that the accused was in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be given an opportunity of establishing that he was not in possession of the controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking, and thereafter the prosecutor shall be given an opportunity of adducing evidence to establish that the accused was in possession of the controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking."

2. Page 1: Strike out lines 26 and 27 of the French version and substitute therefor the following:

"dans cet endroit, qu'il a des raisons de soupçonner d'être en possession d'une drogue"

"offence under subsection (2), he shall be"

4. Page 5: Add immediately after line 6 the following:

(5) Notwithstanding subsection 2(2) of the Criminal Records Act, where, after the commencement of this Part, a person has been directed to be discharged upon conditions prescribed in a probation order under section 662.1 of the Criminal Code for a first offence under subsection (2) of this section and the period for which the probation order is to remain in force has terminated, that person shall be deemed to have been granted a pardon under section 4 of the Criminal Records Act on the date of termination of that period.

(6) Subsection (5) does not apply where a discharge has been revoked under subsection 662.1(4) of the Criminal Code."

5. Page 5: Strike out line 23 and substitute therefor the following:

"than fourteen years less one day."

6. Page 5: Strike out lines 34 to 42 and substitute therefor the following:

"imprisonment for a term of not more than fourteen years less one day."

7. Page 8: Strike out line 17 and substitute therefor the following:

8. Page 10: Strike out lines 9 and 10 of the French version and substitute therefor the following:

"dans cet endroit, qu'il a des raisons de soupçonner d'être en possession d'un stupé."

Your Committee appreciates that its amendment to section 48 in clause 7 of the Bill, set out above as amendment number 4, introduces an exception to the general law under the Criminal Records Act affecting conditional and unconditional discharges under the Criminal Code. It believes that the application of the principle contained in the amendment might be appropriate in the case of other criminal offences where the court directs a conditional or unconditional discharge for a first offence.

Accordingly, your Committee, in addition to the specific amendments proposed, recommends that the Government consider the advisability of extending to other offences the principle contained in the amendment to section 48 so that where an accused is discharged for a first offence, he shall be deemed to have been granted a pardon either immediately, in the case of an absolute discharge, or on the termination of the period of probation, in the case of a conditional discharge.

Respectfully submitted,

H. Carl Goldenberg
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: Not for the adoption of the report, but for leave for the honourable senator to explain the report.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, copies of the report of the committee are being distributed in both languages, so you will have it before you as I speak. This report is the result of hearings which commenced on February 4 last, and which, with the exception of two weeks, have continued every week since then until today. The committee heard witnesses from across Canada and from the United States. We heard the views of representatives of the legal profession, the medical profession, universities, provincial governments, chiefs of police, concerned citizens and others.

Senator Bourget: How many witnesses?

[Senator Goldenberg.]

Senator Goldenberg: I do not have the number, but I think it was in excess of 35 or 40. The amendments which we propose are the result of the studies of the various briefs that we heard.

● (2020)

I just want to make it clear at the outset to honourable senators, although I am sure they know it—the press sometimes seems to forget—that this measure deals with cannabis only. It does not deal with heroin, cocaine or any other hard drug. Secondly, it has nothing to do with the legalization of any drug, including marihuana. The press continues to talk of the Senate or the Senate committee considering legalization. When I outline to you the amendments, and they are not many, you will note that there is no justification for using the term "legalization" in respect of what this committee is recommending to the Senate.

Senator Bourget: Hear, hear!

Senator Goldenberg: Bill S-19 transfers cannabis from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act where it is to be dealt with under a new part, Part V.

We have made eight amendments, as you will see from the report before you. I can save a great deal of your time if I tell you that five of these amendments—the first, second, third, seventh and eighth—are purely of a technical or editorial nature. They do not amend the substance of the bill in any way and I will not take any time in explaining them.

The amendments numbered 4, 5 and 6 in the committee report embody the major changes recommended by your committee. I will deal first with clause 48 of the new Part V, which is number 4 of the committee report and refers to possession of cannabis.

Your committee was concerned that with respect to the offence of possession of cannabis—that is, simple possession for personal use—a criminal record attaches to all first offenders, even to those who have received an absolute or conditional discharge under the Criminal Code.

Under section 662.1 of the Criminal Code, where an accused pleads guilty or is found guilty of an offence other than an offence for which a minimum punishment is prescribed by law, or an offence punishable by imprisonment for 14 years or for life or by death, the court may, and I quote the Code:

... if it considers it to be in the best interests of the accused and not contrary to the public interest, instead of convicting the accused, by order direct that the accused be discharged absolutely or upon the conditions prescribed in a probation order.

This is now in the Criminal Code and has been in the Criminal Code since 1972. It is not being inserted there as a result of amendments by this committee to the bill before us. We learned, however, that a discharge, whether absolute or conditional, does not remove the criminal record. To remove the adverse effects of the record, the person concerned must apply for a pardon under the provisions of the Criminal Records Act. On an absolute discharge for first possession there is a minimum delay of one year. In other words, the person concerned cannot, before one year, apply for a pardon. The committee found that many—in fact most—offenders do not apply for a pardon. It may be that they are unaware of their rights or they may fear the investigations which have to be made following an application. Those who do apply are faced with lengthy delays before the application is disposed of. Until a pardon is granted the record remains.

The committee therefore proposes an amendment which provides that where an accused is discharged under subsection (1) of section 662 of the Criminal Code on a first offence—and we are only dealing with first offences—for possession of cannabis, he shall be deemed to have been granted a pardon under the Criminal Records Act. The pardon will be effective immediately in the case of an absolute discharge, and at the termination of the probation period in the case of a conditional discharge.

This is intended to save the accused, particularly youngsters, from going through life with a criminal record for what I have said is a first offence of possession of cannabis where he has been discharged by the court. The pardon is conditional upon a discharge being granted by the court under the provisions of the Criminal Code. This is the major amendment that has been made to the bill by the committee.

I now come to clause 49(3)(b), which, in the report of the committee before you, is No. 5. This deals with trafficking and possession for the purpose of trafficking. I have, until now, been talking solely of a first offence of simple possession for personal use. I now deal with the penalty for trafficking and for possession for the purpose of trafficking.

Bill S-19, as presented to us, would reduce the maximum penalty, upon conviction on indictment for trafficking and for possession for the purpose of trafficking, to 10 years. Your committee could not agree with this, because it considered trafficking a particularly serious offence. It therefore proposes an amendment which will increase the proposed maximum to 14 years less one day, instead of 10 years. This would be consistent with the maximum for importing and exporting.

Let me explain why the committee fixed 14 years less one day. The purpose of this is to allow the discharge provisions of the Criminal Code to continue to apply, in the discretion of the court, in appropriate cases. The discharge provisions, otherwise, are not applicable to offences punishable by imprisonment for 14 years, and that is why we suggest increasing the proposed maximum from 10 years to 14 years less one day in the case of trafficking and/or possession for the purpose of trafficking.

The next amendment to which I will refer is clause 50, subsection (2), and that is No. 6 of the committee's report. This deals with the penalty for importing and exporting cannabis.

Bill S-19 fixes a maximum penalty of 14 years and a minimum penalty of three years upon conviction on indictment for importing or exporting cannabis. The minimum of three years does not apply where the accused establishes that he has imported or exported for his own consumption only. The committee believes that the courts should not be restricted in any way in the exercise of their discretion in sentencing, and therefore its amendment removes the minimum penalty. The maximum penalty, as in the case of trafficking and possession for the purposes of trafficking, will, under the amendment, be 14 years less one day in order, once again, to permit the court to apply the discharge provisions in appropriate cases in their discretion.

I have now summarized the principal amendments proposed by your committee. Your committee appreciates that its amendment to clause 48, that is, to the clause dealing with possession, introduces an exception to the general law under the Criminal Records Act affecting conditional and unconditional discharges under the Criminal Code, because under the Criminal Records Act there must be an application for a pardon, and we are recommending that in certain cases a pardon be deemed to have been granted. Your committee believes that application of this principle might be appropriate in the case of other criminal offences where the court directs a conditional or unconditional discharge for a first offence. Accordingly, in addition to the specific amendments proposed, we recommend that the government consider the advisability of extending to other offences the principle contained in the amendment to clause 48 so that where an accused is discharged by the court for a first offence he shall be deemed to have been granted a pardon either immediately, in the case of an absolute discharge, or on the termination of the period of probation in the case of a conditional discharge.

This, honourable senators, summarizes the report of the committee and I hope you will pardon me if I repeat something that I have already said. The committee uses the term "discharge" but I want you to remember that the committee is not establishing the principle of conditional and unconditional discharges. The right to discharge is now in the Criminal Code and is exercisable at the discretion of the judge. The committee follows through by recommending that a pardon shall be deemed to have been granted but only in a case where a judge has seen it appropriate to grant a conditional or unconditional discharge for a first offence for the possession of cannabis. That is our principal recommendation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Sparrow, for Senator Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report of the committee:

Thursday, May 22, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, the 20th of February 1975, examined the said Estimates and reports as follows:

1. Your committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of the 20th of February 1975, "to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1976, in advance of bills based upon the said Estimates reaching the Senate."

2. In obedience to the foregoing, your committee made a general examination of the Estimates and heard evidence from the Honourable J. Chrétien, President of the Treasury Board, and Mr. B. A. MacDonald, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board.

3. The Main Estimates for 1975-76 amount to $29,585 million. Of this amount $13,907 million are statutory in nature, $14,335 million represent funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority and $1,343 million are non-budgetary items being loans, investments and advances. In the 1974-75 fiscal year the Main Estimates amounted to $23,297 million and by four Supplementary Estimates they were increased to $28,233 million, of which $12,934 million were statutory in nature, $13,595 million representing funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority and $1,704 million in non-budgetary items.

4. The difference between the Main Budgetary Estimates of 1975-76 ($28,242 million) and the Main Budgetary Estimates of 1974-75 ($22,023 million) is $6,219 million, an increase of 28.2 per cent. It is likely that this percentage increase will also pertain to the difference between the final budgetary authorization for 1975-76 and for 1974-75, observing the increase in budgetary expenditures between March 31, 1973 and March 31, 1974 was 23.7 per cent and between March 31, 1974 and March 31, 1975 was 29 per cent. It is noted that between March 31, 1973 and March 31, 1974 (the latest complete fiscal year for which a figure is available) the GNP increased by 15.6 per cent.

In the same vein, during the last ten years the budgetary estimates have increased from a total $7,979 million in 1965-66 to $28,241 million in 1975-76 which will eventually be larger due to Supplementary Estimates. It is a ten year increase of 253 per cent.

The growth of budgetary expenditures by function between 1966-67 and 1974-75 is as follows:

| | ($ millions) | | |
|---------------------------------------|---------------|---------------------|----------|
| | 66-67 | 74-75 (forecast) | Increase |
| Health and welfare | 1,994 | 7,023 | 5,029 |
| Economic development and support | 1,205 | 4,342 | 3,137 |
| Public debt | 1,191 | 3,175 | 1,984 |
| Defence | 1,651 | 2,512 | 861 |
| Fiscal transfer payments to provinces | 515 | 2,631 | 2,116 |
| Transportation and communications | 941 | 1,934 | 993 |
| General government services | 372 | 1,214 | 842 |
| Internal overhead expenses | 391 | 887 | 496 |
| Foreign affairs | 230 | 512 | 282 |
| Culture and recreation | 218 | 580 | 362 |
| Education assistance | 90 | 643 | 553 |

[Senator Sparrow.]

You will note that by far the largest increase in expenditure is in Health and Welfare, whose percentage of the estimates for 1975-76 will be 27.8 per cent.

Expenditures by the various levels of government, exclusive of transfer payments, have grown between 1964 and 1973 as shown in the following table which is for calendar years and also includes the percentage of the GNP.

| | ($ millions) | | |
|------------------------|-----------------|-----------------|----------|
| | 1964 | 1973 | Increase |
| All governments | 14,905 29.6% | 44,755 37.6% | 29,850 |
| Federal government | 6,758 13.4% | 17,595 14.8% | 10,837 |
| Provincial governments | 3,245 6.5% | 12,993 10.9% | 9,748 |
| Local governments | 3,848 7.7% | 10,500 8.8% | 6,652 |
| Hospitals | 1,054 2.1% | 3,261 2.7% | 2,207 |
| Pensions | -- | 406 .3% | 406 |

Your committee also notes that the number of continuing employees on the 30th of September 1973 was 272,089 and the number of planned continuing employees for 31st of March 1976 will be 321,668. This is a jump of 49,579 or 18 per cent in two and one-half years.

5. In comparing the Main Estimates of 1975-76 with the final authorization of 1974-75 some of the major increases are as follows:

| Increases in Statutory Items | | ($ millions) |
|---|--|---------------|
| Fiscal Transfer Payments Program | | 463 |
| Public Debt Program | | 455 |
| Hospital Insurance Contributions | | 261 |
| Family Allowance Payments | | 171 |
| Medical Care Contributions | | 100 |
| Canada Assistance Plan Payments | | 69 |
| Increases in Voted Items | | |
| Defence Services | | 345 |
| Post Office | | 190 |
| Canadian International Development Agency | | 152 |
| Payment of subsidies on Imported Oil | | 136 |
| Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation | | 100 |
| Accommodation Program | | 97 |
| Royal Canadian Mounted Police | | 74 |
| Northern Affairs | | 65 |
| Correctional Services Program | | 59 |
| Development and Utilization of Manpower Program | | 57 |
| Indian and Eskimo Affairs Program | | 56 |
| Canadian Broadcasting Corporation | | 54 |

|----------------------------------|-----|
| Air Transportation Program | 52 |
| Increases in Non-Budgetary Items | |
| Supply and Services | 185 |
| Canadian National Railways | 147 |
| Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. | 72 |

Your Committee views with concern the continuing authority established by an Appropriation Act of 1965 which gives the Canadian International Development Agency non-lapsing authority to carry over funds from year to year. Your Committee reiterates an opinion that it has expressed a number of times in the past that an authority of this nature should emanate from an act of Parliament and not from an Appropriation Act.

Respectfully submitted.

D. D. Everett,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Sparrow: I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, May 28, 1975, and on Wednesday, June 4, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall be happy to add a word of explanation. As far as tomorrow is concerned, this motion will have practically no effect at all since the committee is scheduled to sit "at 3.30 or when the Senate rises." The motion is simply made as a precaution in case there should be some overlapping, amounting to perhaps a few minutes or a quarter of an hour at the most. That is one of the reasons for it. The other reason is that witnesses have been called and sittings have been arranged since last week, and I mentioned this meeting in dealing with the business of the Senate on the motion for adjournment on Thursday afternoon last. The same explanation applies to the sitting arranged for the following week.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES (INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS) ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator van Roggen moved the third reading of Bill S-25, to amend the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hays, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-24, intituled: "An Act to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Choquette).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Choquette moved the adjournment of this debate last week at my suggestion simply to permit the sponsor of the bill, Senator Hays, to comment on the questions raised by Senator Grosart. Therefore, with the permission of the Senate, I am prepared to yield now to Senator Hays.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform the Senate that if Senator Hays speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, questions were asked during the debate on second reading of Bill S-24 by Senator Grosart, and I shall attempt to answer some of them. I should at this stage inform the Senate that if this bill receives second reading it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration.

In dealing with the questions asked I shall not stay necessarily with the order in which they were asked. The first question, I think, was as to the meaning of the term "wholesale bank". It is within the concept of this expression to distinguish from existing banks the proposed operation of the new bank, which will engage in consumer-oriented activities—that is, retail business. It should be observed, however, that the Mercantile Bank of Canada is similar to that which is proposed. In other words, it will carry on much the same sort of business as the now functioning Mercantile Bank of Canada.

● (2040)

Another question related to the pension funds of crown corporations being invested in the new bank. Of 25 trustee pension funds of crown corporations which were approached, none has invested or even committed itself to invest in the new bank. These trustee pension funds are professionally managed and controlled by trustees with responsibilities to look after the interests of the beneficiaries, and to invest in a broad range of stocks, bonds and mortgages, including bank stocks. In most cases their investment powers are restricted by the provisions of existing legislation.

I believe, honourable senators, those were the two main questions. If there are any other questions that honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: I believe the use of a name which is somewhat similar to those of two other banks now actually in operation was also raised.

Senator Hays: In connection with the name, I have spoken to the principals of the proposed bank and they are quite prepared to reconsider and devise a name that would be satisfactory. They are not bound to the name National Commercial Bank of Canada, and do not wish to infringe on the rights of others. In this regard they would be pleased to consider a change of name and, as a matter of fact, would probably suggest another one at the time of the bill's examination in committee.

Senator Langlois: Has this name been cleared with the proper authorities?

Senator Hays: It is either in the process of being cleared, or has been cleared.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Hays, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion, in amendment, of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Norrie, to the motion of the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C.).

Senator Robichaud: I yield to the Honourable Senator Croll.

Senator Croll: Thank you, Senator Robichaud.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Honourable Senator Croll speak now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, this bill, together with another, deals with a very important subject. The legislation now under consideration concerns commutation and, more particularly, the royal prerogative. The bill introduced by Senator Argue provides for the abolition of capital punishment. In my opinion, the Robichaud bill raises some questions of advisability and constitutionality; it tampers with justice and mercy. Under pressure of events, and from his experience and knowledge of political practice, Senator Robichaud drew up a rather clever bill and presented it for the consideration of the Senate. However, some real difficulties exist in connection with it, and we also have Senator Argue's bill respecting abolition.

Senator Flynn: Is that a new manner of describing bills, by way of the name of the sponsor?

Senator Croll: I am sorry, but the designations S-21 and S-23 really do not help.

Senator Argue's bill on abolition calls for a straightforward yes or no to the question, "Are you in favour of capital punishment, or are you against it?" Debates have taken place in this chamber which have been both erudite and well reasoned. However, my own impression is that no one listens. If today's debate is missed there will always be another tomorrow, the day after and the day after that, and decisions we seldom make.

There is in this country at the present time a great moral issue—that of capital punishment. The young are interested, the old are concerned, and wherever one goes the issue follows. Unlike other great issues, this cuts across political lines, cultural outlooks, educational attainments and religious beliefs. One could walk into a union hall, a university faculty meeting, or a religious conclave and hear definitive, honest, deeply held views on either side of the question. If honourable senators remember the speech made by Senator Hicks during the debate—

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking to the amendment, or to the main motion?

Senator Croll: I am speaking to both the amendment and the main motion. It is a general debate.

Senator Flynn: The motion is that the bill be not now read a second time, and that the subject-matter be referred to committee.

Senator Langlois: It is a bilingual speech.

Senator Flynn: It would be more orderly if you would speak to the amendment.

Senator Croll: I will be getting to it, but I am now indicating my view as to what should be done.

The speech of Senator Hicks, who is a man of great intellect, an outstanding citizen, was in favour of capital punishment, but he concluded by saying there is no reason to consider him—and I paraphrase—a savage because of that belief. On the other hand, the speech of Senator O'Leary, also an outstanding citizen of great intellect, was all in favour of abolition, and implied that anyone who did not agree with abolition was, naturally, a savage.

Senator Flynn: That is out of order and irrelevant.

Senator Croll: We cannot tolerate a law in this country which one may or may not follow. That applies to governments as well as to individuals. A law might be wrong, in which event we must change it. Social views change, standards change, and laws change. The question of capital punishment is being debated in this country to such a degree today that I believe the people are ahead of the politicians. A great number of them have made up their minds, or are making up their minds, even before all the evidence is in. We in the Senate are senior parliamentarians, we are elders, we are statesmen—

● (2050)

Senator Bourget: And we are slow.

Senator Croll: And we have lived for a considerable number of years. We are experienced and knowledgeable. We are people of considerable attainment and good will. We have been shocked by hangings and by murders and in the present confusion, now is the time not only for us to speak out but to take decisive action.

The Gallup Poll is heeded in this country, private polls are given credence, and, in my opinion, the time has come for a Senate poll. The time has come not for talk, not for discussion, not for pussyfooting, but for decision.

It is my suggestion that we should do as the House of Commons does on various occasions when an important subject arises, and that is set aside a special time—it may be one day, two days or more—for the purpose of discussing this very important problem. We can set aside one or two days, and fix a definite time for a vote, and every senator could be notified to be on hand at that time. It may be that a new argument will be presented, although I doubt that very much, but the country needs guidance and leadership at this time. This is a grand opportunity for us to have a sober first thought rather than a sober second thought, because we are not messengers, we are not delegates, but persons in our own right and we know our responsibilities.

This is a new role and it should be a welcome one. I am sure the country would appreciate our efforts, would be influenced by our conclusions and impressed by our decision, because this is a matter of life and death. It is a very important matter.

Senator Flynn: Obviously.

Senator Croll: It is an opportunity we should not miss. My recommendation is that rather than deal with this bill at the present time, we should, once and for all, deal with the problem of capital punishment and make a decision, so that the country will not lean toward an emotional decision arising from fears and prejudices.

This chamber has a voice of understanding, it has reason and experience. Those qualities are available to the people of Canada, and they should be welcomed.

I repeat, we should not proceed with the bill at the present time, but should proceed on the main question—namely, that contained in the bill introduced by Senator Argue. There should be a special debate on it to attract attention. If a time limit of 20 minutes were imposed on speeches it would be possible for many honourable senators to speak on the subject and thereby give the country the benefit of their views, because the views of the Senate are worthwhile.

I hope that consideration will be given to my suggestion, and that the bill introduced by Senator Robichaud will not be proceeded with until we decide what we shall do with the other bill of a similar nature that is before us.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in order that we may consider the words of Senator Croll, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Croll: Senator Robichaud asked for the adjournment.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN TEXTILE PROBLEMS—SUBJECT MATTER REFERRED TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 21, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Desruisseaux calling the attention of the Senate to Canadian textile problems.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, first I wish to thank you for allowing me the opportunity to pursue this subject.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I wish to thank the government leader for the report he presented last Wednesday on the efforts made by the government and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to improve the situation of the Canadian textile industry. Of course, I approve the efforts of the department and I want to show my gratitude and my appreciation. I do not want to undervalue the action of the minister and his team.

[English]

I commented last Wednesday that the setting aside of the proposal for a committee inquiry and report on the Canadian textile industry, and the foregoing of any hope of appropriate constructive committee recommendations, was both deplorable and regrettable. It would give the impression that the government wishes to evade any textile inquiry while the department proceeds in its review of the policy without the embarrassment of Senate recommendations.

Despite the accomplishment of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, rightly heralded by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the question of Canadian textiles remains a major problem. The industry employs some 20 per cent of all manufacturing workers in Quebec, and it is also of primary importance in Ontario. What has been done about the problem in the last few years is not enough. The situation remains unsatisfactory, not only in the opinion of textile workers and the industry but also in the opinion of many economists.

I believe that sooner or later—probably sooner than we think—there will have to be important political international trade policy changes, not only in the textile industry but affecting nearly every federal trade policy touching our secondary industries which provide our industrialized provinces with the greater part of their daily bread and butter, and, until recently, a guaranteed balanced economy.

During the past three years we have witnessed our largest international trade deficits ever. This is not our first such experience. Until a decade ago, such trade vacuums were filled by foreign money investments which were then welcomed in Canada. A few days ago we were still heralding our wish to become more independent of foreign investments, while we were short of more than $5 billion to cover recent trade deficits.

Canadian trade exports are now dropping persistently, and the tempo is increasing. Our position is disturbing. We can hardly sit back and just reason, as we have heard, that it is caused by a Canadian depression. We know that our export trade, whatever remains of it now, is in good part being bought at a very high price by Canadians. It is being paid for by Canadians with the allowance of mass imports that we are committed to protect, as well as through the lifting of our protective tariffs pursuant to our international agreements which, as we know, are presently not paying off at all.

Whatever the heralded claim that efforts are now being made to improve Canadian textile production, the grave situation in the textile industry persists. It is the cause of a justified major Canadian concern. To me, these are facts and happenings that transcend any explanation given by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The department has the full responsibility for textile trade policies, and those policies, as I said, are proving unsatisfactory, regardless of the minimal corrections that have been witnessed lately.

No other industrialized country allows the disintegration of its secondary industries, or allows the long delays we in Canada have allowed before giving consideration to some form of protection to ease production problems. No country has allowed imports to rapidly take over a larger and larger share of its domestic market, as has been the case in Canada. Why is it being allowed in Canada? Is it not a weakness we should correct?

The Textile and Clothing Board, to which many references have been made, is, in reality, constrained by the narrow jurisdiction conferred upon it by Bill C-125, which forces it to operate under a very rigid concept of proof of damage or injury. Its role, widely broadcast, has been limited, for the most part, to examining historical situations of damage or injury, rather than being enabled to take a forward look at the possibilities of the industry's expansion and development. Need I also underline the delays in reacting to injurious import pressure which has arisen because of considerable intergovernmental consultations after board recommendations have been made?

There are indeed many questions about the textile industry in Canada that should be answered. It is time to re-examine, as other countries have done and are doing quite regularly, our trade policies governing access of imports to the Canadian market, and we need only look to the highly successful American experience in that regard. Would it not be better to have such a re-examination before the undertaking of an official departmental review, since the report of the department will commit the department and the minister and will then reset the government's textile policies?

Why is it that people in the textile industry are never, or seldom, in on these studies or the information of revised policies? Why is it that an official channel is not provided through which the industry itself can have an input into the negotiation of restraints, and even into the discussions on Canadian textile policies?

It is difficult to understand why restraints have been negotiated with so few countries, and why the products covered by such restraints are so few. Why have the exporting countries been given the responsibility for the often too slack enforcement of restraints? Why is it that Canada is one of the very few industrialized countries which has no machinery for imposing mandatory import quotas?

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

Two years after the joint union-management submission, the then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced the federal government's plan to introduce the Canadian textile policy of the 1970s. Was this not too long a delay for an industry in deep trouble, principally because of government policies?

The government announced that its textile policy was, first of all, to protect the textile industry; secondly, to see to it that the industry could compete on an equal footing in the home market with foreign goods marked up by the value of the tariff; and thirdly, to retain the advantage for Canadian textiles. None of these objectives have been realized. Nowhere in its policies does the federal government assume responsibility for the survival and health of the Canadian textile industry, as it has done in respect of other industries in trouble.

I must reaffirm again, because of what was said, that one of the mandates of the Textile and Clothing board, as we are all aware, is to conduct inquiries in order to determine whether certain goods are being imported into Canada in such a manner as to cause or threaten serious injury to Canadian textile production. In making its recommendations, we realize that the Textile and Clothing Board has to take into account five given sets of circumstances, some of which take away its freedom in making recommendations. It finds itself handcuffed, so to speak, and handicapped to the extent that it is prevented from freely reaching its decisions and making the recommendations it desires.

Since the Textile and Clothing Board was set up some four years ago, it has examined 14 textile products or product groups. It has issued 30 reports and reviews, and one interim report. To correct any possible wrong impression, let me say that in 10 cases it found injury or threat of injury, and in five cases no injury. Approximately 26,600 people engaged in the production of goods were injured or threatened with injury by imports, and this was said to represent 14.9 per cent of the total work force in textiles and clothing as of June 1971.

In spite of their importance to the survival of the industry, the board's recommendations were only fractionally followed. Moreover, the nearest the board got to initiating its own inquiries, as article IX of the act allows it to do, and as the concerned industry had hoped, was a decision to hold a new inquiry into the shirt situation, after having twice reviewed and recommended the continuation of the restraints it had originally proposed. There were actually some 30 reports or reviews in four years, with an average time lag between the announcement of an inquiry and the submission of conclusions to the minister of about four and a half months. Admittedly, it did not leave the three-man board with much time to undertake inquiries on their own. It seems as if the watchdog role that is now being spoken about was somewhat beyond its capacity.

According to an important report on the textile situation, until February 1975 all recommended protective measures were directly against low-cost countries, usually in Asia or Eastern Europe. Although complaints of injury caused by United States or Western European exports had been brought forward—and they were again last week in a full page report in Montreal's La Presse—the Textile and Clothing Board considered that the tariff or anti-dumping legislation could offer sufficient protection. In the last four or five years, I believe, the increased importation from the United States alone was 109 per cent. Yet, it was notorious that anti-dumping was scarcely applied. In the case of polyester filament yarn imports, however, the board finally recommended adoption of a surcharge to set a floor price for the commodity in Canada without calling back on the quantity available for fabric manufacturers.

One has the strong impression that the board has been somehow making a real effort to keep restrictions to a minimum and to exclude related product lines in which Canadian manufacturers are not as threatened, according to a report not yet released. They were piecemeal and backward affairs rather than forward-looking at the advancement and expansion of Canadian textiles.

Mr. Pepin's textile speech had also a formal promise. Canada Manpower Centres would work closely with firms laying off workers in the context of the policy. But despite the prevailing low level of skills, the well-known immobility of workers in primary textile areas, such as my own area, the policy made no innovations in this field and thus did not really keep the promise made. This, however, did affect our unemployed textile workers.

One report underlined that the Textile and Clothing Board mandate, which was to examine the production in Canada of specific products in terms of possible injury from imports, viability and acceptability of adjustment plans, would inevitably lead to a piecemeal approach. The board should be allowed to adopt a more comprehensive forward-looking mandate for its inquiries. This could have been helped by a Senate committee study of the textile industry. There is dissatisfaction with the way in which the government implemented the Textile and Clothing Board recommendations and outweighed the primary manufacturers' satisfaction with the board's understanding of their problems. Delays, dilution of recommendations and poor government-industry relationships were objects of criticism. There was and is general tardiness anyway in accepting the board's recommendations, in negotiating agreements, and in publishing and enforcing them. These are said to be some of the drawbacks of the present policy.

There was much frustration since, after having successfully proved the existence of imminent threat and damage from exports, those concerned were obliged to wait several months before import restraints were finally negotiated with exporting countries. Damage was thus done to the industry, and through the use of this time device textile workers became unemployed. There was much dilution and alteration of the Textile and Clothing Board recommendations. This was not in the spirit of the guidelines given in the textile policy speech. The textile industry, however, was again getting the raw deal accolade.

In the case of shirt quotas, the board recommended that a global quota be negotiated "at the earliest practicable date," but not later than October 1, 1971. It was in fact negotiated November 30, 1971, and was thus much less effective than planned by the Textile and Clothing Board. It appeared to have been made to work against our textile industry in spite of the favourable recommendations of the board.

Restraints on double knit and warp knit fabrics were somewhat different from those recommended by the Textile and Clothing Board, but again the textile industry was the loser. In its first report on this, the board recommended that restraints be negotiated separately with Japan, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and South Korea, but not later than July 1, 1972. I believe our leader said something about the arrangements. On October 3, 1972, the minister announced that the board's recommendations had been accepted, but although the restraints negotiated respected the overall ceiling suggested by the board, no restraints had been negotiated with Hong Kong or Taiwan, and that of South Korea came into effect only on October 1. Again the textile industry became the heavy loser.

In December 1972 the board had recommended that steps be taken to prepare the imposition of a surcharge on imports of polyester filament yarns. The board also stated that it would have to recommend the immediate use of such a surcharge if the situation did not start improving.

● (2120)

The government made no official comment at the time, but when the Textile and Clothing Board recommended the use of a surcharge to set a floor for yarn prices in Canada, the minister refused to adopt the recommendation on the ground that the government required further information. That had the effect of giving another black eye to the Canadian textile industry. The minister is not, of course, obliged to accede to the board's recommendations. He may refuse to consider the board's recommendations or he may modify the recommendations after consulting with the interdepartmental committee and with the other members of cabinet. It is possible also that the minister, despite having accepted certain recommendations, will find that in practice it is not possible to negotiate restraints in accordance with those recommendations.

I said in April that the arrangements regarding international trade in textiles did permit mandatory restraints under certain circumstances, but that this was not popular—as is well known in government circles.

According to a non-governmental confidential report which has not yet been published, it seems as if the government prefers to modify the Textile and Clothing Board's recommendations in order to negotiate voluntary export restraints. The government has really been leaning backward to give foreign exporters an over-generous deal.

In concluding my remarks this evening, may I emphasize that it is absolutely necessary for the primary sector to develop a much better relationship with those responsible for implementing the board's recommendations than presently exists. The evidence is that restraint agreements do not at all encourage domestic industry to feel it is a partner with government in the implementing of a textile policy established to help Canadian textiles to survive and expand. The policy should be reviewed and altered. Whatever controls are imposed or negotiated should be policed much more attentively than has been the case. Past reluctance to do so has had the result that Canada has not been as well served as it should have been. The volume of imports into this country should be controlled by Canada, not by the exporters' home governments. Overshipment should be penalized and annual limits should be broken down into monthly limits, or at least quarterly shares. This would help clear up some of the confusion.

In the requests for a tightening-up of Canadian import procedures, both control and surveillance are at issue. There should be an immediate, efficient, country-to-country registration of all imports of goods that have been subjected to Textile and Clothing Board inquiries. The rationalization of the tariff structure for textile and clothing goods should be made without further delay, in accordance with what was promised.

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin announced that anti-dumping procedures—which predate the textile policy—would be used to complement the policy, and that, if necessary, modifications would be made to the anti-dumping regulations. But anti-dumping sanctions are never imposed until such proof is forthcoming. In other countries, including the United States, sales below cost are also treated as dumping, and sanctions can be imposed as soon as the suspected dumping is reported. That procedure is effective and has produced excellent results in those countries. Canadian anti-dumping laws should be revised along similar lines to be made more effective.

Recently we were informed in the Senate that the advisers of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to textile matters are currently reviewing the 1970 policy developed by the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin. I can only express the hope that this time, when the policy is reviewed, it will be reformulated with the help of the leaders of our textile industries. After all, they are the people principally interested in the success of an effective textile policy. They are interested in the general prosperity of their workers and they certainly know better than anyone else the problems inherent in the textile industry in respect of production, marketing and importation.

So far as I am concerned, regardless of what we have heard here or anywhere else, the textile industry has certainly had a raw deal, especially with respect to the textile workers who are now unemployed.

Honourable senators, when I first brought the problem of the textile industry to the attention of the Senate, it was my intention to help those unemployed workers of the industry and to help the textile industry as a whole. I felt reasonably sure that their problems would receive the best possible consideration in this forum. Both personally and on behalf of the unemployed workers of the textile industry, I should like to express my gratitude and appreciation to all of you who have participated in this debate. However, I feel compelled to say that I fully disagree with certain of the statements of the department as reported here last Wednesday. I do not intend to rebut what was said on that occasion, though. For that matter, it would not change anyone's thinking anyway.

Having said that, I should like to quote what was said last Wednesday:

The position of the government at the present time is that the most useful way of studying the textile industry problems is by this departmental review. There is no present intention to introduce measures in the House of Commons to study this matter, in view of the review which is going ahead in the department.

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

That is a clear indication that no committee inquiry is presently desired by the government, and for that reason I will not make a motion to instigate a Senate committee inquiry. I do not agree, however, that the way the minister is proceeding is the most useful way of studying our complex textile problems. The facts on textiles have been exposed as thoroughly as possible in this place so far; however, there is little chance to analyze them fully here. There is also reason to believe that a textile policy that was established after all sides had been heard would have been more helpful than the one that can now be expected.

● (2130)

The situation created by massive textile unemployment is nothing short of a scandal. It is regrettable that it took demonstrations by unemployed textile workers to attract public and government attention. In a small way, what has been said here on textiles was intended to reactivate a more serious analysis of the textile problem by the department. The unexplainable rigidity of certain people in relation to the board's and the industry's recommendations does not make it easy to have any well-intentioned appraisal of the causes of textile problems.

To me the present policy on textiles, and the policies respecting a number of imports affecting our secondary industries, are responsible for an appreciable proportion of Canadian unemployment.

In 1976 we have to renew our GATT arrangements with foreign countries. As I have said, it seems certain that we are preparing badly for this. The cost to Canadians of gaining so few advantages was too high in the past. It contributed too much to our international trade deficits, and did too much damage to the important area where textile and other secondary industries operate.

Two weeks ago the leader of the separatists in Quebec, René Levesque, with the help of our good old CBC, expounded on what the federal government was doing to my province with its secondary industry trade policies. Mr. Levesque made me feel that we were, to all intents and purposes, the sacrificial goats of the federal department in its trading with foreign countries, the object of which was to gain certain advantages through grain sales which we would have made anyway. I foresee that if the present rigidity of policy is maintained, there will be a still higher price to be paid by Canadians.

I have tried to inform the Senate, the government and the public on certain textile facts, as correctly as I could. I hope what I have said has been taken or interpreted as a desire to contribute constructively. I want to thank Senator Asselin, Senator Bourget, Senator Grosart, the Leader of the Government and others for having helped to air some aspects of this important problem. I do hope it was not in vain.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would now like to put a motion. I thought that at the end of his speech Senator Desruisseaux would move that the inquiry be referred to the appropriate Senate committee for thorough consideration of the problem, since the purpose of that inquiry in the Senate was, I think, to draw the attention of the many organizations dealing with the textile industry. Moreover, I would believe that although an extensive debate was held in this house, since several senators have spoken on the matter, the public would be interested in learning more about the textile policies of the government. This is why, in view of the debate which was held here, I think that it would be proper for me to put a formal motion to the effect that the inquiry be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for thorough consideration.

AIRCRAFT REGISTRY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Bourget, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report of the committee:

Wednesday, May 21, 1975

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred the Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft," has in obedience to the order of reference of October 23, 1974, examined the said bill and now reports as follows:

Your committee recommends that this bill be not proceeded with further in the Senate for the following reason:

This bill, which would establish in Canada a central aircraft registry, deals with the protection of certain property rights and other interests in aircraft and, in the considered view of your committee, its enactment by the Parliament of Canada would, in the absence of a clear judicial determination of its constitutionality, give rise to considerable uncertainty as to whether or not the matters to which it extends come within a class of subject over which the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction.

Your committee further reports that in the course of its consideration of the constitutional aspects of this bill, a letter from the chairman was sent to each of the provincial attorneys-general to solicit their views on the proposed legislation. In replying to the letter, the provinces expressed concern over the constitutional problems the bill would create in the absence of clearly valid complementary federal and provincial legislation. The provinces, as well as the witnesses heard by your committee, expressed the view that the bill, if enacted, would result in confusion, unless some effort were made in consultation with the provinces to resolve in advance potential conflicts with existing provincial statutes relating to property rights and mortgages.

Respectfully submitted.

Maurice Bourget
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft" was read the second time and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

A number of witnesses appeared, including representatives of various financial institutions and the Canadian Bankers Association, as well as an official from the Legal Branch of the Department of Transport. Written representations had also been submitted by the Canadian Bar Association and other interested parties.

Following discussions in committee, the chairman was authorized to contact the attorney general of each and every province and seek their reaction to this legislation generally, but especially to its constitutional aspect. Their reply can be summarized as follows—I understand that this correspondence, both in French and English, was placed on the desks of honourable senators—as I was saying, their reply can best be summarized as follows: All stated that this legislation is ultra vires, because it infringes provincial jurisdiction, mainly in the area of property and civil rights, some of them going so far as saying that, should it be adopted, they would go to court to fight it. However, they added that they approved the idea of the establishment of a Central Registry Office in Canada, and that they were willing to cooperate with the competent federal authorities to find a satisfactory solution to the problem.

Considering the overall situation, and in view of the many amendments suggested by several witnesses, the committee came to the realization that passage of such a bill as S-5 would create much uncertainty and confusion. As a result, it was unanimously decided that study of the bill would be discontinued and that a report would be submitted to the Senate requesting the government to reconsider study of the bill after consultation with the provinces.

Members of the committee expressed hope that both levels of government would find some grounds of agreement so that the bill, which is of great interest to several financial institutions, as well as the Canadian transportation industry and the Canadian Bar Association, may come back to us soon in a form more acceptable to all parties concerned.

Honourable senators, with the unanimous support of the members of the committee, I recommend adoption of this report.

• (1410)

[English]

Honourable senators, before resuming my seat, I would ask that the correspondence exchanged between the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications and the provincial attorneys general, and certain federal departments, including letters and telegrams, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today's date.

I was told earlier this afternoon that perhaps it would not be possible to get permission to have this correspondence printed as an appendix because we have not as yet had an opportunity to seek the permission of the provincial attorneys general to do so. However, because of the fact that this correspondence has been in part, if not wholly, read into the proceedings of the committee and forms part of the evidence of the committee, I do not see any objection to it being printed as an appendix to our proceedings. Someone may have a different view on that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this correspondence be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today's date?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence, see p.990)

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, we have accepted that the report be submitted today in order that senators might look into it immediately and, above all, to allow the committee vice-chairman to explain the major points which have led to the report's conclusions. I think it would not be fair for senators, and particularly for those who are not members of the committee, that the report be agreed to today. I agree that the committee's conclusions reflect its members' unanimous views. I will myself have some remarks to make on the matter to allow senators, and particularly again those who are not members of the committee, to look into the report, and to look also into the correspondence with the provincial attorneys general and other people, to be better informed about the crux of the matter. I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

[English]

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Macnaughton, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee:

Wednesday, May 28, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-32, intituled: "An Act to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, May 20, 1975, examined the said bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 2: Strike out lines 23 and 24 and substitute therefore the following:

"for delivery outside Canada or for use as bunker or aircraft fuel outside"

2. Page 15: Strike out line 9 in the French version and substitute therefor the following:

"jours de sa signature ou, si le Parlement ne"

Respectfully submitted,

Alan A. Macnaughton
Acting Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Macnaughton: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I have prepared a few notes of explanation which I hope will explain the bill, to a certain degree at least.

Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Bill, was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on May 20 and was considered by that committee on May 21 and May 28. Nine amendments were proposed. Of the seven amendments proposed by the government, six were purely technical, intended largely to correct inconsistencies between the English text and the French text.

One government amendment, which introduced a new clause, clause 95(2), was intended to remove a possible administrative difficulty. The substance of Part III of the bill depends on the prescription of prices by the Governor in Council pursuant to either clause 51(1) or clause 52(1). Dependent on these two subsections is a series of clauses, clauses 53 to 65 inclusive, which are administrative in nature. Without the new clause 95(2), it was thought the situation could have arisen in which the administrative clauses, clauses 53 to 65, might on enactment of the bill precede the implementation of clause 51(1) and clause 52(1) rather than follow such implementation. The intent of the amendment is to ensure that the administrative clauses do indeed follow the substantive clauses upon which they depend.

Officials of TransCanada PipeLines Limited sought, and were granted, permission to propose amendments to clauses 53 to 64. The texts of the amendments as formally laid before the committee had been agreed to between officials of the government and TransCanada PipeLines Limited.

● (1420)

The concern of TransCanada PipeLines derived from a possible conflict they saw between certain commercial obligations on the one hand and compliance with the bill on the other hand. Clause 53(1)(a) and clause 53(1)(b) prohibit the movement and acquisition of gas from within a producer-province for consumption outside that province unless the price paid for the gas is approved by the National Energy Board. There was no corresponding prohibition on the sale of gas in similar circumstances. The company saw a risk that they might be contractually bound to buy gas at a price not approved by the board and yet be legally prohibited from moving it out of the province. They therefore proposed the introduction of a prohibition on the sale of gas, except at a price approved by the National Energy Board. Such a provision would remove any possible conflict between their obligations under contract and under the bill. It must, of course, be remembered that Part III deals only with gas in interprovincial and international trade and not with transactions wholly in the province of production.

The amendment proposed by TransCanada PipeLines to clause 64 was to remove an uncertainty as to the determination of "cost of service" pursuant to clause 64(1). The amendment provides that in determining cost of service, the National Energy Board will apply the same principles as it would use under Part IV of the National Energy Board Act. The effect of this is to ensure that the company does not find itself operating under mutually inconsistent rules. All of the amendments to which I have referred were approved by the committee.

The bill is a complicated proposal to deal with a complicated situation in a complicated industry. With this rather technical explanation, I would hope honourable senators would adopt the report.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would hope that Senator Macnaughton would not expect us to adopt the report immediately. We gave Senator Macnaughton consent to move the adoption of the report today to enable him to explain the amendments made by the committee. As in the previous case, it would be unfair to have the Senate approve these amendments without having had a chance to read them after listening to the senator's explanation. Therefore, with the idea of making a few comments on the report, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion, in amendment, of Senator Neiman to the motion of Senator Robichaud, for the second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the amendment moved by Senator Neiman is that Bill S-21—which was called the "Robichaud Bill" by Senator Croll yesterday—be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In substance, Senator Croll said yesterday—and although I do not necessarily agree with the rest of what he said I agree with this—that that would be a useless exercise by the committee, if we were to approve Senator Argue's bill providing for total abolition of capital punishment. For that reason I think the motion should stand until a decision is taken by the Senate on the bill favouring total abolition. That would, of course, require the implicit consent of the Leader of the Government to have the Senate take a vote on that bill. I hope the leader, or the deputy leader, will soon be able to tell us whether the government is willing to let the Senate proceed to a vote on the bill favouring total abolition of capital punishment. In order to give the government a chance to do so, I move the adjournment of the debate at this time.

Senator Langlois: I can only say that, as usual, the Leader of the Government is in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: You may say that he is in the hands of the Senate, but I have seen some hidden hands operating.

Senator Langlois: You are having visions.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT, CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, having nothing to add to the remarks I made last night, I now move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Goldenberg, seconded by Senator Cottreau, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, since this report is extremely important, I would like to discuss it more extensively, but as I am not ready to do so today, I suggest that the debate be adjourned to Tuesday next, June 3.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1976, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, as authorized by the Senate, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance examined the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976.

Your committee made a general examination of the estimates and heard evidence from the Honourable Jean Chrétien, President of the Treasury Board, and Mr. B. A. MacDonald, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch of the Treasury Board.

● (1430)

The main estimates for 1975-76 amount to $29,585 million. Of this amount $13,907 million are statutory in nature, $14,335 million represent funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority and $1,343 million are non-budgetary items, being loans, investments and advances.

In the fiscal year 1974-75, the main estimates amounted to $23,297 million. By four supplementary estimates they were increased to $28,233 million, of which $12,934 million were statutory in nature, $13,595 million represented funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority and $1,704 million being non-budgetary items.

The difference between the main budgetary estimates of 1975-76 of $28,242 million and the main budgetary estimates of 1974-75 of $22,023 million, is $6,219 million, an increase of 28.2 per cent.

The percentage increase in budgetary expenditures from March 31, 1973, to March 31, 1974, was 23.7 per cent. Between March 31, 1974, and March 31, 1975, it has 29 per cent.

It should be noted that the GNP increased only 15.6 per cent between March 31, 1973, and March 31, 1974, the latest complete fiscal year for which figures are available. This means that federal government expenditures were 8.1 per cent higher than the increase in GNP in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974, and when final figures are out on the GNP for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, the percentage increase over growth in the GNP will probably be 14 per cent higher.

During the last 10 years budgetary estimates have increased from a total of $7,979 million in 1965-66 to $28,241 million in 1975-76. It is a 10-year increase of 253 per cent. This compares with a cost of living or inflationary increase of only 61.2 per cent in the same period.

Mr. Chrétien, in his appearance before your committee, stated that he is hopeful that the actions Treasury Board is taking in asking departments to reallocate existing resources within the department, wherever possible, to look after unforeseen requirements, will reduce the need to ask Treasury Board for additional funds, therefore reducing the total amounts asked for in supplementary estimates.

He stated he is hopeful that by so doing the total increase in expenditures for the fiscal year will not exceed an increase of over 16 per cent, which compares to the previous figures I mentioned of an increase of about 25 per cent per year in spending.

I must add that Mr. Chrétien said he was using these figures on the information he has available at this time and that these figures could change when a new budget is brought out next month.

I do hope the minister's optimism in showing a reduction in increases to 16 per cent from the last two years, which have averaged a 25 per cent increase, will prove to be well founded.

It is very disturbing to see a continual increase in the percentage of federal government spending in relation to the GNP, and it is particularly disturbing when we realize that the percentage being spent by provincial and municipal governments is also increasing at an alarming rate. From 1949 to 1973, the percentage of GNP spent by all three levels of government has increased from 22.8 per cent to 37.6 per cent, and when fiscal figures are out for 1974 and 1975, I believe this percentage will again be found to have moved upward.

It is incumbent upon all of us to ask for spending restraints in these times of high inflation, high unemployment and the potential loss of foreign markets.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SPRING MEETINGS AT COLOMBO, SRI LANKA

Hon. Frederick William Rowe rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Spring Meetings of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Colombo, Sri Lanka, 31st March to 5th April, 1975, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Meetings and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada; and to the visit of the Canadian Parliamentary Delegation to Pakistan. 7th to 11th April, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, to allay any possible apprehensions let me say at the outset that I have no intention of treating this house to a travelogue. As I think honourable senators will recall, I was invited to be the representative of the Senate on the Canadian parliamentary delegation to the spring meetings of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held in Colombo, Sri Lanka, which we older people remember better as Ceylon—a name which, incidentally, I found in conversation with the Prime Minister and others is still in use and perfectly acceptable in Sri Lanka. They have no objection at all to the use of the name Ceylon.

I might mention in passing that the same delegation was invited by the Parliament, and, I suspect, inferentially by the Government of Pakistan, to visit that country between April 7 and April 11, and we did so. As your representative on the delegation during the visits to those two countries, it is my duty to give a brief report to the Senate, and this report will consist primarily of impressions which I gained, not only from the conferences, but also from previous international conferences connected with UNESCO and the Inter-Parliamentary Union. I also took the opportunity to pay visits to other countries while flying between Pakistan and Canada—some ten altogether.

[Senator Sparrow.]

The main items discussed at the Colombo Conference this spring revolved around:

(1) Disarmament, particularly the use of nuclear and chemical weapons and the relationship of military planning to the possibility, the very real possibility, perhaps even the reality already, of environmental and climatic changes,

(2) Human rights in general with special reference to voter participation in the parliamentary process, and the role of Parliament in defending the rights of women, and the role of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in attempting to prevent cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment, which is something which we normally gather together in the one word, torture.

This is, rather ominously, I think, something which has become increasingly prevalent in recent years, and is not isolated merely to those countries of the world which we regard as being dictatorial or operating under a dictatorship or oligarchy.

The third item on the program was economic cooperation, and the fourth was modern scientific techniques for the promotion of education.

It is well known, of course, by all in this chamber that the Inter-Parliamentary Union does not possess international executive powers and cannot impinge on the rights and prerogatives of the sovereign parliaments which make up the Union. Honourable senators are also aware that the criticism has often been made that the Union is nothing more than a debating organization. In the light of the Union's history, I do not consider this criticism to be valid. The fact is that the Union is made up of some 75 parliaments of the world. Consistently those parliaments send significant delegations, often composed of well-known distinguished parliamentarians and statesmen, to participate in the various conferences. For example, I personally have met at these conferences among the American delegates—perhaps I should mention that the United States invariably sends large delegations, made up of some of their most distinguished parliamentarians—men of the calibre of Senator Taft. My friend Senator Macnaughton will recall that at Rome we had Senator Taft and Senator McIntyre; men of the calibre of former Senator Claude Pepper, now Representative Claude Pepper; men of the calibre of Representative McClory of Illinois, probably one of the most influential men in the House of Representatives in the United States, among others. I mention this to indicate that those parliaments which make up the Union do take the Union seriously.

It is true that the Union does not have executive powers, but the delegations do carry back to their respective parliaments and, I suppose, indirectly to their respective governments, the opinions and impressions they gain from mixing with other parliamentarians. Moreover, the resolutions adopted at the meetings of the Inter-Parliamentary Union invariably have a moral impact on the thinking and planning of those countries whose parliaments are members of the Union. For example, Senator Macnaughton, Senator Eudes and two or three other senators who were at Rome two years ago will recall that one of the most important topics discussed there was the use and problem of drugs and, in particular, the approach of the various countries to the problem of marihuana. I do not believe it was any coincidence that in the two and a half years now elapsed since that conference a number of countries, and states within countries, have modified and—and I use this word deliberately—humanized their laws respecting the use of marihuana. In my opinion a great deal of that modification to a more humane approach to this problem resulted from the discussions of the Inter-Parliamentary Union on the matter of drugs at Rome two and a half years ago.

The visit of the Canadian delegation to Sri Lanka was of particular interest, since that country has been intimately associated with Canada's foreign aid program. In fact, honourable senators will recall that the historic Colombo Plan actually initiated Canada's entry on a significant scale into the field of foreign aid. It is, of course, well known that extensive aid has been given by Canada to both Sri Lanka and Pakistan. Indeed, I believe it was the desire of the Government of Pakistan that we, as representatives of Canada, should see at first hand the results of our aid. I believe it was rather significant. They were not ashamed of it; they had nothing to hide and wanted us to go there and see at first hand, with our own eyes, what Canadian aid has helped to do in Pakistan in recent years.

I believe that was the reason for their extending a special invitation to the Canadian delegation—not to any other delegation, but to the Canadian delegation—which was attending the conference in Ceylon, to go on to Pakistan and spend a week there as the guests of the government in order to visit every part of that nation, from the Khyber Pass to Lahore, Islamabad, Karachi and many other places in between.

I do not intend to give details with respect to that, as I believe honourable senators are pretty well familiar with the details of our aid in that region but I shall make a few general comments with respect to it as I go along. First, I would like to say that one would naturally expect that Canada would be held in high esteem in a country such as Sri Lanka, for example, to which Canada has given generous assistance. However, I do not believe that the respect in which Canada is held and the popularity of Canadians generally—this is not a little bit of fatuous opinionatedness, but the fact is that Canadians generally are rather popular all over the world. That is seen over and over again when we wear the little badges with the flag of Canada while travelling through some strange part of Asia, Africa or Europe. When someone spies that little emblem, there is almost invariably a spontaneous outburst of friendliness. Other honourable senators have experienced that repeatedly, as I have. I wish to say that I do not believe that that respect and popularity can be entirely construed as a show of gratitude. Some of it is gratitude, naturally, but the fact is that Canada is held in high regard in countries which have never been the recipients of Canadian aid.

I do not believe that this respect and popularity represents a temporary or recent phenomenon. Indeed, in my opinion, we can say that since World War II and, in particular, when the late Mr. Lester Pearson was in the diplomatic field, Canada's position in world opinion improved steadily, and has remained on a high plateau for many years. I do not believe that this regard or respect at the present time is to be attributed largely to the respect in which the present Prime Minister of Canada is held internationally. One does not have to be politically motivated to recognize and concede that Mr. Trudeau is regarded as a world statesman outside Canada and that his approach to international—

Senator Flynn: Outside Canada—okay.

Senator Rowe: It goes without saying that he is regarded as such within Canada. I am sure Senator Flynn would agree with that.

His approach to international matters as manifested, for example, in recent weeks in his statements at the Mansion House in London and, more recently, in Jamaica, indicate that when he does speak he commands world attention and respect.

However, I believe and repeat that the respect in which Canada is held transcends the personal popularity of such men as the late Mr. Pearson and Mr. Trudeau. The reasons for this popularity are, I believe, the reflection of the basic decency and humanity of the Canadian people generally.

I have been privileged to have been a member of five—which is not very many compared with the experience of some of my colleagues in this chamber, but they were invaluable experiences for me personally—five delegations to international conferences, two of them UNESCO, at which I believe every country in the world except one was represented. The reaction of other delegations to Canadian opinion and proposals, in my view, has invariably been characterized by a recognition that Canada has been motivated not by selfish and narrow nationalistic considerations, but by an acceptance on the part of Canadians that Canada is part of the world community of nations and, as such, has a responsibility for, and an obligation toward, the needs of the component parts of that world community, as well as a responsibility to the world community as a whole.

I should also like to say at this time—and in saying this, I would exempt myself—that in my experience Canada has been well represented by its delegations to those conferences which I have attended, and I believe it is true of delegations to other international conferences which have characterized the three decades since World War II.

It is a truism to say that Canada is one of the privileged nations of the world. We have our problems, some of which are pretty serious at this moment, but we are still considered to be a privileged nation. We are sometimes guilty of the fallacy of thinking that the United States and Canada have the highest standard of living in the world. We do not. The highest standard of living is not to be measured by per capita income alone. When we couple a few Texas billionaires with the thousands of poverty stricken people who live in Harlem and say the average income is such and such, that is not a true measure for the standard of living in the country as a whole. I believe the highest standard of living in the world is to be found in some of the smaller countries of Europe, notably Sweden, Norway and Denmark, and possibly Switzerland and Holland. Nevertheless, compared with most of the world, Canadians enjoy standards of undreamed of luxury compared with those who live in other countries.

We have, under our jurisdiction, a disproportionate share of the earth's resources. We cannot remind ourselves of that too often. Allowing for temporary economic, social and cultural dislocation, our future is far brighter than that of many other countries in the Asian, African and South American continents. It is precisely because we do enjoy such relative affluence, and control so much of the earth's resources, that we have an obligation to share our good fortune with those who are less well off. Common justice and common humanity demand this approach. I suggest also that commonsense demands it. We Canadians would be impossibly naive if we assumed that our approximately 20 million people were going to be permitted indefinitely to enjoy an increasingly higher standard of living, and to control so much of the world's wealth, while the disparity between the few million people in Canada and the billions who live outside this country continues to widen.

Canada is not the only country that provides aid to the third world, but I am happy to report that one aspect of our aid was singled out for favourable comment during our discussions in Sri Lanka and Pakistan. Unlike some other countries, Canada does not attach political conditions when providing aid. It has been all too obvious in recent years that in some instances aid from affluent, wealthy countries to less fortunate countries has been withheld for the explicit purpose of undermining a left wing but, in some cases, democratically and constitutionally elected government, and of replacing it with a right wing totalitarian regime which, as soon as it is in power, has enjoyed the greatest possible support, financially, militarily, and in other ways. I do not need to go into detail. The lessons of the past few years are all too familiar. The inexplicable thing about this policy is that it has been followed by some countries dedicated constitutionally to the democratic way of life. It is one of the great puzzles of our time that countries dedicated constitutionally to the democratic way of life have behaved in such a way in their treatment of other countries.

I am proud to report that Canada's attitude in this regard has, in general, been above reproach. No country is morally justified in using human suffering and need as an excuse for interfering with the internal administration of another country, no matter how repugnant the form of government might be.

Senator Flynn: Even if it is a right wing totalitarian state? You seem to contradict yourself.

Senator Rowe: Children in countries under dictatorial and extreme right wing control, or in countries having a fascist regime, and those living in socialist and communist countries, suffer the same when they are equally hungry.

Senator Flynn: I was wondering what difference you make between a right wing totalitarian state and a left wing totalitarian state.

Senator Rowe: I make no difference when it comes to providing human aid. I was contrasting Canada's attitude. Canada makes no difference. She does not say that because a country has a right wing government, or because it has an extreme left wing government, she is not going to give it aid.

[Senator Rowe.]

I do not share the philosophy and views expressed in respect of Vietnam by a well-known American general who, three or four years ago, said that somehow or other they had a different approach toward death from that held by us. I am of the simple opinion that if we drop napalm on the body of a five-year old Vietnamese, that child would suffer just as much as if he or she had been a Canadian.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is so.

Senator Rowe: Having said that, I cannot help feeling that Canada should express—both to countries receiving aid and to the third world community in general—its concern and apprehension over the frightening increase in world population in general and, in particular, in some third world countries which clearly have little prospect of ever being able to feed and care for their present population.

● (1500)

I am glad to put on the record—and I think I am expressing the opinion of the Canadian delegations with regard to both Ceylon and Pakistan—that Canadian aid to those countries has worked miracles. There is no doubt about that. The feeling of the Canadian delegations was that Canada's assistance has been utilized to maximum benefit. Some of us, however, could not help but feel frustrated at the effect of the increases in population on the Canadian aid programs. For example, we visited the great Bata Shoe factory near Lahore, which was established with Canadian aid, where we saw between 5,000 and 6,000 men working steadily for reasonably good wages. However, we could not help but feel frustrated when we remembered that 5,000 or 6,000 represents only the population increase in Pakistan over the course of a few weeks, or a few months.

Incidentally, some of our hosts expressed the same sense of frustration. Much of the economic and social value of our assistance has been nullified by the increase in population over the period involved. The situation is similar to that of the character in Alice in Wonderland who was racing so fast but did not seem to be moving. Someone asked him why he was racing so fast, and he said, "I have to race this fast to try to remain in the same place." Unfortunately, the aid provided by Canada and other countries to the third world countries has not even kept pace with the population growth in those countries. I will have more to say about that in a few moments.

This situation is apparently getting worse, aggravated, in part, by natural disasters, some of which ominously appear to be resulting from climatic changes on a world-wide scale—changes that are already affecting the productivity of some of the most fertile and heavily populated areas of the earth.

I was able to obtain the figures in relation to population growth on the earth from United Nations records. I knew the situation was bad, but I had no idea that it was as bad as it is. I invite honourable senators to listen to the figures. The population of this earth has doubled in the last 30 years. It is increasing at the rate of 200,000 a day. Tonight there will be 200,000 more people on this earth than there were last night. By the end of this year, there will be between 70 million and 80 million more people on this earth than there were at the end of last year, all of whom have to be fed and cared for. The earth's population is increasing at the rate of 70 million to 80 million a year.

No matter what technical, scientific or humanitarian measures that we bring to bear to feed and clothe, or to try to feed and clothe and care for these people, the indisputable, frightening fact is that we have already passed the point where we can meet the needs of the world's population.

The figures from the United Nations show that at this very moment, while I am speaking to you, there are 500 million people suffering from starvation, disease, malnutrition, and the very worst form of poverty—not the poverty that we think of here in Canada at all, but the poverty of starving children, the poverty of people dying in the streets, and people stepping over them and walking on. These are impartial figures. I do not think anyone can say that they are biased or in any way inaccurate because of political or other considerations.

I come now to what I regard as the crux, the apex, of my remarks. How can we in Canada and in other developed countries justify passively accepting, or even encouraging, the present birth rate around the world when we know that millions upon millions of the children involved are inevitably doomed to an early and agonizing death, either from starvation or from disease brought on by malnutrition and by indescribable poverty? Quite obviously, one of the great needs of the world at this moment is more birth control.

Let me say at this point—and I realize the import of what I am about to say—that I do not regard abortion, which in the minds of some may be considered therapeutically necessary and justifiable, as an acceptable form of birth control. Having said that, let me say that the irony of this whole situation is that if birth control education and family planning facilities were more widely available, the demand for abortion, with all of its consequent abuses, would be reduced almost to the point of disappearance.

There are some who will object to birth control on religious or other grounds, and will object to almost any kind of what most of us consider legitimate forms of family planning and birth control. I do not dispute the rights of those people to object to all forms of birth control, but those people—and this is a fact which is not generally appreciated, or perhaps not even known generally—represent a very small minority of the earth's total population.

I posed the question of birth control to the government leaders in both Pakistan and Sri Lanka. I will not name the individuals concerned for obvious reasons, but I was assured by them that the major religions represented in those countries had no objection on religious or theological grounds to the institution of birth control measures. We were assured that the partial failure of the birth control programs in those countries was the result of economic and cultural factors—the fact that in the past, in order to have one or two children to help with the land, they needed to have a minimum of 10 children born. I invite honourable senators to appreciate the significance of that.

I repeat, we were assured that the failure of family planning measures in those two countries was not the result of objection on religious grounds, and I repeat also that the vast majority of the world's population have no objection on religious grounds to birth control. Those who do object to all effective forms of birth control are, of course, placing themselves on the horns of a moral dilemma, knowing, as they must, that with an unrestricted birth rate, which is what we have in the world today, a goodly portion of the resultant children will never know anything in life except suffering, disease, starvation, and an agonizing death.

I am not talking about the possibilities of the future; I am talking about what is happening right at this moment. Without being unduly emotional about it, I think we need to remind ourselves that at this very moment millions of people, many of them children, are dying of starvation, not only in Bangladesh, not only in some remote country in Africa, but in dozens of countries on at least three continents. We must face up to the inexorable fact that there is an arithmetical limit to the number of people the earth can sustain, even at present standards, and that, as the population increases, inevitably the proportion of those who must starve to death will increase. That is a fact. We must face up to it. It is a matter of arithmetic.

I said earlier that I do not regard abortion as an acceptable form of family planning and birth control. In the same breath I want to say that I do not regard mass starvation or universal malnutrition, with all its implications, as an acceptable way of limiting the world's population. For my part, given a choice between watching millions of innocent people die agonizing and horrible deaths and instituting birth control and family planning measures, I would have no hesitation.

I said earlier that Canada has not attached political conditions to its aid, and that is something of which we should be proud. But much of our aid is going to countries that have some of the highest birth rates in the world. I throw out a suggestion at this point. Perhaps we should give consideration to attaching one condition, namely, that for countries where starvation and nutritional diseases are rampant a prerequisite of Canadian aid should be the institution in those countries of a determined and unrelenting program of family planning. When governments and other agencies in such countries institute such programs—and I say this with full realization of what happened in the United States a few years ago—or try to institute measures for controlling population, measures for family planning, Canada should be foremost in supplying the scientific, educational, medical, financial and moral support to help make those programs successful. In my view, in the long run, and perhaps in the short run, any other way is madness.

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Was the Canadian delegation invited to visit the Tarbela Dam, which was constructed in about 1957, with a contribution from Canada of more than $35 million? Also, can he say what was the effect of its construction on agriculture in the area?

Senator Rowe: In a way, I am glad the honourable senator asked that question. The fact is, I did have it in my supplementary notes, but in the interests of time I omitted to refer to it. In Pakistan we did visit the dam. We walked over it. It is a rather terrifying spectacle. It is 1,000 feet high, and with only one false step you can roll down that 1,000 feet. We saw that great dam, the Tarbela Dam, at the head of the Indus River. It is the greatest dam of its kind ever constructed in the history of man. That dam, and the auxiliary development, makes possible, among other things, the generation of tremendous amounts of energy, and also, perhaps more important, the irrigation and subsequent cultivation of land that otherwise would remain semi-desert, but which now provides for the subsequent feeding of tens of thousands of people.

Had time permitted I would have liked to give more details about the various aspects of Canadian aid, about projects into which Canadian aid has been funnelled. Senator Deschatelets mentioned the figure of $35 million for the dam. I heard the figure of $40 million of Canadian money mentioned as going into that project. Incidentally, our aid may have been the catalyst. I think the cost of the dam is already over $1 billion. It is one of the great developments of its kind, comparable perhaps only to the Churchill Falls development in Labrador.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, at the risk of keeping you for a few moments longer, I should like to make one or two comments on Senator Rowe's very moving address on aid to developing countries. I do not think the honourable senator has given the whole picture. I believe that Canadians would be inclined to be more generous—certainly they can afford to be—if they were completely satisfied that the aid was reaching the people it was meant to help. There have been many reports of misdirection of assistance, both government and private, intended for needy people, with the misappropriation that often goes on in these countries, where some of the bureaucrats seem to distribute food in certain directions that are of more interest to them. I think Canadians generally are concerned about that, although, as the honourable senator rightly said, our funds are still used there productively in most cases.

Senator Rowe: In those two countries.

Senator Buckwold: I think Pakistan has been a matter of great concern to us. I have been to Sri Lanka. There I believe we do get value for our money. Speaking not from personal experience but only from reports, I am not so sure that is always the case in Pakistan. If we want the best Canadian efforts made to help these people, who need this assistance so desperately, then certainly Canadians have to be assured that the funds are reaching the people they are meant to help.

My second observation concerns Senator Rowe's comment on birth control. He indicated that perhaps a condition of Canadian grants should be that, unless a heavily overpopulated country institutes an effective program of birth control, our aid will not be extended to it. At a conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association that I attended in Sri Lanka last year, this proposition was put forward by one of the Canadian delegates, a member of the House of Commons. To say that it was not well received is probably an understatement. Many of these people take a different attitude towards population than the one expressed by Senator Rowe. They indicated that their best natural resource is their own people, and that it is criminal to tell them to cut back on the very thing that would give them the strength to develop their own country. Granted, this creates problems, but they turn these problems back on the developed countries, asking for help to feed these people, so that they can then have the population to develop their own resources. This is the way they see it. It is a completely different picture from the one that Senator Rowe gave us in his speech today.

At that conference we spent some time in seminars and general sessions discussing population control. The only really successful program has been in Singapore, where they actually have moved towards real population control. I think the rest are just going through the motions. Although some of them are expressing a great interest, they are really not effectively controlling the tremendous growth in their populations, nor in my opinion do they really want to.

At the World Population Conference in Bucharest, which took place last year, the same opinions were expressed, namely, these countries feel that people are their resource and that it should not be the western world or the developed world that tells them to minimize that resource, and they place on us the responsibility to see that they are fed.

Honourable senators, I have one last comment—and I am not in any way deprecating the very fine speech of Senator Rowe. I wanted to add these particular comments because I think they are ancillary statements that have to be presented when considering Canadian aid to these countries. To me, more food is not necessarily the answer. It will meet the emergencies. It is obvious that we must develop the techniques in those countries that will help them to feed themselves by producing their own food. We must direct our aid not so much in actual food as in the money and know-how to enable them to develop their own resources, such as a productive grain and agricultural industry, with cattle raising and so on. We should provide the kind of training that will enable them to do this. To my mind, the real direction of Canadian aid has to be toward helping countries to help themselves. If we can do that, I think we can achieve some of the worthy objectives that Senator Rowe has passed on to us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

REGULATIONS RESPECTING ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS— SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday last, May 22, 1975, as reported at page 961 of the Debates of the Senate, Senator Greene spoke as follows:

I rise pursuant to rule 33 which provides that a motion calling upon the Senate to take action may be moved without notice, and in such a situation all other things may be set aside.

Yesterday's Minutes of the Proceedings failed to record a motion I made pointing out that the proposal made by Senator Godfrey was out of order in that it affected the balance of national accounts.

And then the honourable senator referred to an alleged ruling, and concluded by saying:

Therefore, I respectfully move, on a question of privilege, that this motion and Your Honour's ruling thereon should have been included in the Minutes of the Proceedings for yesterday.

Because I had some doubts as to the acceptability of such a motion I indicated that I would look into the question raised and report later. I propose to do so at this time.

I have looked carefully at the record of the Debates of the Senate for May 21, 1975, and have concluded that on that day Senator Greene made a suggestion rather than a motion and that no ruling was in fact made by me, although I did make a few observations respecting Senator Greene's remarks. What I said was:

I think no point of order arises. I am advised it is a legal opinion, but we are not dealing with a bill. That is the problem. If I understand it correctly, Senator Greene's objection is based on rule 62 which says:

The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

What I was then trying to convey was that, in attempting to formulate a ruling on the point of order, some important questions of law and perhaps even the Canadian Constitution would inevitably have been involved, in particular the meaning and effect of two related acts of Parliament. Those acts are the Senate and House of Commons Act (R.S.C. 1970, c. S-8), in particular section 40 thereof, and the Statutory Instruments Act (S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38), in particular the requirement that proposed regulations must go, before final adoption, to the Privy Council Office, where there is consultation with the Department of Justice on all aspects of the regulations.

Senator Godfrey, in moving his motion, indicated that he was endeavouring to comply with both of these acts of Parliament. Accordingly the motion dealt with proposed regulations for submission to the Privy Council Office rather than with regulations to be adopted forthwith.

It is quite clear from the authorities that the Speaker will not make decisions on legal points. Bourinot, in his Fourth Edition, at page 180, states:

[The Speaker] will not give a decision upon a constitutional question, nor decide a question of law, though the same be raised upon a point of order or privilege.

Also there are a number of precedents in this house to the same effect. The most recent appears to have been the ruling of Mr. Speaker Deschatelets, reported in Debates of the Senate of June 20, 1972, at page 505.

Perhaps, without attempting to give a legal opinion, I might observe that section 40 of the Senate and House of Commons Act appears to confer a very limited regulation-making power on the Senate, and certainly not a power that could possibly result in any increased charges on the public treasury, or amount to an "appropriation" within the meaning of Senate rule 62.

Finally, the subject-matter of Senator Godfrey's motion has been referred to a committee, and the course of wisdom, on my part, would be to refrain from commenting further.

In the foregoing circumstances, it appears to me that there was no point of order or ruling of the character that would require an entry in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for May 21.

In conclusion, and in accordance with modern Senate practice, this statement will be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

AIRCRAFT REGISTRY BILL

CORRESPONDENCE EXCHANGED BETWEEN THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS AND THE ATTORNEYS GENERAL OF THE PROVINCES AND CERTAIN FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS

November 12, 1974

The Honourable C. Mervin Leitch, Q.C.,
Attorney General of Alberta,
Madison Building,
9919-105 Street,
Edmonton, Alberta.
Dear Mr. Leitch:

RE: Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft".

The Senate has referred the above bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. The following documents relate to the legislation in question:

1. Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft".
2. First proceedings on Bill S-5, dated October 31, 1974.
3. Copy of submission by the Federated Council of Sales Finance Companies.
4. Supporting statement respecting the above brief.

From a perusal of the enclosed documents you will see that members of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications were concerned about several aspects of the bill under consideration. This concern was prompted by the facts that

- (a) the bill is being considered in the first instance by the Senate, and that
- (b) according to the evidence, there has been as yet no official consultation with the provincial governments on the matter.

The Department of Justice has expressed the view that the bill in its entirety is within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada. Nevertheless, the field of protection of proprietary and other interests in aircraft is now evidently occupied in large measure by provincial laws and it was feared that there might arise some confusion and uncertainty in this area, at least in the absence of a clear judicial determination as to the constitutionality of the bill and in the absence of any reaction to the bill from the provinces.

I have, accordingly, been requested by the committee to solicit your views on the foregoing matters.

Hoping for an early response, I am

Yours sincerely,

J. Campbell Haig,
Chairman,
Standing Senate Committee on
Transport and Communications

RE: Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft"

Dear Senator Haig:

In further response to your letter of November 12, 1974, the various documents which were provided along with a copy of the above bill clearly establish the need and desirability for some type of central registry system for property interests in aircraft. However, I do have some doubt as to the constitutional validity of the bill.

Admittedly there has been no definitive judicial determination concerning the matter in question, but the bill unquestionably deals with property rights in their most basic sense in that it provides for their protection, as well as defining the parameters and extent of such rights. As the bill, particularly in light of Section 17, purports to supersede all present provincial legislation which provides for the protection of property rights insofar as they relate to aircraft and may, apparently alter common law rules relating to the rights of repairmen, it attempts to set up a complete code of property interests relating to this subject matter.

As such, my reaction, as a result of some research and thought on the matter, is that such legislation is properly within the legislative competence of the various provinces.
While certain provinces already have central registry systems for interests in chattels which are defined in the various provincial personal property security statutes sufficiently broadly to include aircraft in Manitoba, our Personal Properties Security Act (SM. 1973, c.5) has not yet been proclaimed. Certainly, the implementation of such legislation by all the provinces might provide an effective means of protecting security interests in aircraft.

I thank you for soliciting my minister's views on this matter.

Yours truly,

Gordon E. Pilkey,
Deputy Attorney-General,
Province of Manitoba.

RE: Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft"

Dear Mr. Haig:

I have had an opportunity to review the material enclosed with your letter of November 12, 1974, in relation to the above bill.

As you point out, aside from the constitutional problem (which in my view is a very real one) there would appear to be potential conflict with existing provincial laws. A number of provincial statutes of general application, as well as the rules of civil procedure in this Province deal with proprietary rights in chattels, and methods of protecting and enforcing those rights.

While the proposed legislation may be desirable, it seems to me that confusion and uncertainty will be the inevitable result unless some effort is made, in consultation with the provinces, to resolve these conflicts, many of which are referred to in the evidence of the Senate committee proceedings enclosed with your letter. Even if the provinces were to enact legislation excluding aircraft from those statutes of general application which relate to property rights in chattels, it seems to me that the constitutional problem still remains.

Neither I nor officials of my Department have had an opportunity to make a thorough examination of the constitutional question. However, it does seem to us that certain portions of the proposed Act relate to property and civil rights and civil procedures, and not to aerial transportation. Section 10 in particular, on the face of it, seems to fall within those classes of subjects reserved to the provincial legislatures by Section 92 (13) and (14) of the British North America Act. Even if, after more thorough research, the Provincial Attorneys General were to agree with the view apparently expressed by the Department of Justice on the constitutional problem, members of the private sector who are affected could challenge the legislation, so that uncertainty would continue until there has been a judicial pronouncement.

My department would be pleased to consult further on this problem with other provincial and federal officials.

Yours very truly,

Allan E. Sullivan,
Attorney General,
Province of Nova Scotia.

Quebec City, Quebec,
January 25, 1975.

Senator J. Campbell Haig,
Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications,
The Senate,
Government of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.
Dear Sir:

The Office of the minister has forwarded to us your letter of last November 12, concerning Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft".

It seems that the Department of Justice cannot reasonably take a final stand regarding Bill S-5 as long as the government has not brought down the amendments it apparently wants to introduce.

On the other hand, it is certain that the Government of Quebec wishes to retain full jurisdiction on the registration of all movables. Indeed, it is emphasized in the brief submitted by lending institutions that they will cautiously keep on recording such rights in each province in addition to doing so with the central registry.

Thus, it might be desirable that the federal act provide for a mechanism that would recognize the validity of registrations made in each province, of which the Federal Department of Transport would have received a copy.

Such exchange of documents should obviously be charged to the central registry. It goes without saying that the proposed mechanism requires prior consultation with the various registrars of the provinces.

Yours truly,

André Gélinas,
Research Director.

The Honourable Maurice Bourget,
Deputy Chairman,
Standing Senate Committee on
Transport and Communications,
The Senate,
Ottawa, Ontario.
Dear Sir:

The examination of the implications of Bill S-5 as they affect the Province of New Brunswick has required careful consideration by this office. After serious deliberation on the matter it is felt that this province cannot agree to simply abandon its jurisdiction over aircraft which are chattels and fall within the legislative jurisdiction of this province.

The proper method of creating and implementing the scheme proposed by Bill S-5 would be by means of federal/provincial agreements supported by compatible federal legislation based thereon rather than the federal government's simply assuming a jurisdiction which it is submitted it does not have thereby further confusing the situation which Bill S-5 presumes to clarify. While it is accepted that the idea of Bill S-5 is basically sound and that federal legislation is necessary to implement the international convention, it is the means of implementation without clear guarantees of provincial rights in aircraft as chattels to which this province objects.

It is urged by the Province of New Brunswick that the method above suggested for the implementation of the scheme proposed by Bill S-5 be carried out. Otherwise, those having 'interest' in aircraft will be in no clearer position if Bill S-5 were to be passed with the ever present possibility of constitutional challenge from the provinces. Interest holders will simply have to register in one more registry office with no more certainty of protection thereunder than under the current practice.

It is hoped these suggestions will be considered by the committee in deliberations on Bill S-5 in furtherance of good federal-provincial relations and in light of this province's real concern for the constitutional issues involved.

Yours truly,

Paul S. Creaghan

Further to your correspondence regarding Bill S-5, this will advise that Saskatchewan is not in agreement with the opinion of the federal Department of Justice that Bill S-5 falls entirely within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada. It is our view that the bill in many respects involves matters reserved by the British North America Act to the provinces as being in relation to property and civil rights in the province. In addition Saskatchewan is concerned that the establishment of a central registry system limited to aircraft could create more legal and administrative problems than it resolves. Accordingly it is our position that consultation with the provinces rather than legislation is indicated at this time.

British Columbia's Reply to the Senate of Canada Standing Committee on Transport and Communications—Request For Comments on Bill S-5

It is respectfully submitted that in its consideration of Bill S-5, the Senate Standing Committee on Transport and Communications consider the following views of the Province of British Columbia.

Constitutional Considerations

1. Legislation relating to the registration of financial interests in aircraft is clearly within provincial jurisdiction under the provisions of Section 91(13) of the B.N.A. Act (property and civil rights).

2. The proposed federal legislation is seen as going beyond the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, as the dominant aspect and effect of the legislation relates to property and civil rights. The proposed legislation would not merely touch on some aspects of exclusive provincial jurisdiction in an ancillary manner, but would rather effectively and primarily deal with property and civil rights, under the guise of aeronautics legislation.

3. That if the federal bill is enacted and the suggestions that applicable provincial legislation be repealed are accepted, existing property rights derived from valid provincial legislation would appear to be abdicated in favour of Ottawa.

Practical Considerations

1. British Columbia has established and presently maintains a central registry for the filing of security interests in chattels. The registry system embraces security interests in aircraft. The procedure can be found to exist in the Conditional Sales Act, the Bills of Sale Act, and the Companies Act.

2. The Mechanics' Lien Act of the province deals specifically with protecting the security of workmen and suppliers who have expended labour and materials on the repair of aircraft.

3. Some of the submissions advocate somewhat of a self-interested and convenience-oriented position.

4. The federal scheme would deprive the provincial resident of the convenience of the existing system of registration. Presumably he would need to retain an Ottawa agent to effect searches, etc. The establishment of a federal regional office in the province would only serve to replace the existing system with a similar one.

5. Existing provincial legislation makes mandatory the registration of security interests thereby establishing recognized priorities. The proposed federal legislation in favour of a less desirable system would provide only information to those interested with the ranking of priorities only effective between the parties who had registered.

6. The passage of the federal legislation would result in a duplicity of registries in respect of those provinces, such as British Columbia, which would not wish to remove the application of its registry system to aircraft.

7. The proposed federal legislation may disentitle owners of aircraft in the Province from the extensive benefits of the "seize or sue" legislation, presently existing.

Summary

Leaving aside the constitutional issues, the practical benefits to be derived from such legislation, that is, the claim of greater protection for the financial institutions, reduced cost of financing to the borrower, and the practically enforced compliance to a registration system in jurisdictions not presently enjoying one, may have merit. Those benefits, though attractive in the abstract, do not arise, solely from the concept of the suggested single registry in Ottawa.

Although British Columbia is opposed to recommending this proposed legislation it should not be taken as rejecting other alternatives which may be explored to derive similarly practical results. The establishment of central registries in all the provinces could be urged forthwith, through the medium of the Uniformity Commissioners recommending the enactment of reciprocally compatible legislation by the provinces, without a compromise of constitutional jurisdictions and local interests.

Respectfully submitted,

The Attorney-General for the Province of British Columbia.

RE: Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft".

Dear Mr. Bourget:

Further to my letter dated January 31, 1975, to the Honourable J. Campbell Haig, this is to further advise you that this province feels that an authorization for seizure of an aircraft should be made to the Supreme Court of the province and not to the Federal Court of Canada. This province is concerned about the progressively expanding jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Canada.

Minister of Justice,
Government of Newfoundland.

RE: Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft".

Dear Senator Haig:

Thank you for your letter and enclosed documentation of November 12 relating to the above-noted bill. As the proceedings before your committee revealed there was no official consultation with our province on this matter.

It is the opinion of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador that the proposed bill deals primarily with property rights and therefore the Parliament of Canada lacks jurisdiction in this matter. Our province is certainly not willing to ignore the constitutional implications of the bill because of the practical benefits that would be afforded to financial institutions.

If the bill is passed in its present form, uncertainty in this area will continue in the absence of a clear judicial decision and the Province of Newfoundland may therefore have to refer this matter to the courts for judicial determination.

Yours sincerely,

T. Alex Hickman, C.R.,
Minister of Justice,
Government of Newfoundland.

As Deputy Chairman of the Committee, I have been authorized by the committee to forward this correspondence to you for your information.

It is the wish of the committee to proceed with its study of above bill as soon as possible and, to this end, a committee meeting is being arranged for the early part of March.

RE: Bill S-5—An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

Dear Senator Haig:

The Premier and Attorney-General, the Honourable Alexander B. Campbell, has requested that I reply to your letter of November 12, 1974 concerning the above captioned matter.

I have examined the materials enclosed with your letter and researched the problem posed by Bill S-5. After discussing the matter with the Deputy Attorney General, it is our opinion that Bill S-5 is related to the property and civil rights, a field assigned by the B.N.A. Act to the provinces. As such the matter should be thoroughly discussed with the provinces before any legislation is passed.

I thank you for soliciting my minister's views on Bill S-5 and the Department of the Attorney General would be pleased to consult with federal and provincial officials on this matter.

Yours truly,

Provincial government views will be expressed directly to the Government of Canada and therefore I anticipate making no personal submissions before your committee.

John T. Clement,
Attorney General of Ontario.

April 4, 1975

The Honourable Maurice Bourget,
Deputy Chairman,
Standing Senate Committee on
Transport and Communications,
The Senate,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Senator Bourget:

The Attorney General, the Honourable John T. Clement, has requested that I reply to your letter of February 28th, enclosing correspondence and referring to Senator Haig's earlier letter with respect to Bill S-5 "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft".

I fully appreciate the desirability of the objective of Bill S-5 to establish in each country a single internationally recognized central registry for the recording of all interests in aircraft of the nationality of the country. It would give protection to Canadian interests and convenience and certainty to commercial transactions relating to aircraft. In accordance with this view, my comments are put forward in a cooperative spirit. However, an examination of the bill has lead me to the conclusion that, in its present form, it will not accomplish this objective and will be attended by unnecessary legal problems. Two main aspects of the bill concern me.

In my view, the bill in its present form is at least in part of doubtful constitutional validity. Its validity would appear to be intended to rest on Parliament's authority to legislate in relation to aeronautics and aerial transportation and to legislate for the purpose of implementing an International Convention. The scope of the authority of Parliament in relation to both of these matters is not clearly defined. Certain provisions of the bill would seem to go beyond either of them even if the most favourable view is taken of Parliament's authority and to relate to matters of provincial competence. For example, the bill abrogates the rights of a creditor to seize under provincial law a non-commercial Canadian aircraft in the exercise of a contractual right to enforce a security interest acquired under such law if the security interest is unrecorded in the central registry, although no person other than the debtor and creditor has any claim with respect to the aircraft (cl.8(b)). Such a provision does not appear to be required by the terms of the Convention (Art. 1, para. 2) nor does it seem to be legislation in relation to aeronautics or aerial transportation, but seems to be legislation strictly in relation to property and civil rights in the province. The validity of this and other more significant provisions of the bill can only be finally settled by the courts and until this is done, will remain uncertain.

Again, the provisions of the bill do not seem to have been prepared with sufficient thought given to integrating them with existing provincial laws. In some provinces, statutes require registration under them to give validity to security claims over chattels as against third parties. It would appear that the validity of an interest recorded in the central record is to be determined in part under provincial law. What is the position of an unregistered but recorded interest? Also, the transitional clause (cl.17) leaves the operation of provincial laws with respect to securities given before the coming into force of Bill S-5 uncertain and indefinite as to the period during which they will operate. Other examples are given in the submissions already made to your committee.

Until all these uncertainties are resolved, I suggest that the objective Bill S-5 will be substantially defeated since lenders desiring to ensure protection for security interests in aircraft will probably find it necessary to comply with both provincial laws and Bill S-5. Even then their rights will not be clear until the extent to which the bill overrides provincial law is established. I am sure no one will contend that the existence of such uncertainties in a field where significant commercial transactions must be founded on certainty of the law can be justified.

I have given some thought to the ways in which these uncertainties could be eliminated.

I do not think that a reference of the bill to the courts would be of assistance. The question of its validity arises with respect to several of the provisions of the bill and raises many questions that it would be undesirable to deal with in the abstract. Moreover, it would not, I suggest, be possible to refer questions to the courts that would settle the operation of the provisions of the bill in all of the 10 provinces.

For these reasons, I would respectfully suggest that Bill S-5 should not be proceeded with until after a consultation between the appropriate federal and provincial ministries has taken place. The bill might be revised to establish a scheme enacted by clearly valid complementary federal and provincial legislation. Its terms could also be revised to clarify and make certain the effect of recording in the new central record under the law of each province.

I should also add that I feel that it is undesirable from the point of view of cost and delay to confer discretionary jurisdiction on the Federal Court to regulate seizures of aircraft operating on scheduled air services where a judgment of a superior provincial court authorizing such seizure has already been obtained. Any special considerations governing the seizure of such aircraft should be written into the bill and could be applied in the provincial courts. This new extension of the already over-extended jurisdiction of the Federal Court is unnecessary.

I thank you for soliciting the views of this ministry on this matter.

Yours truly,

F. W. Callaghan,
Deputy Attorney General,
Province of Ontario.

Director, Legislation Section,
Department of Justice,

Dear Mr. Gibson:

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is presently considering Bill S-5, "An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft". Some time ago I was instructed to seek the views of the provincial Attorneys General on said bill. To date, the three attached replies to our queries have been received.

This morning the committee instructed me to renew our request to the Attorneys General, forwarding at the same time copies of the replies already received. I was also instructed to acquaint you with these developments and to seek your advice as to the possibility of our committee amending the legislation without violating the terms of the treaty which it seeks to implement.

I should like to hear from you as to your availability to so advise our committee, either by appearing before it or submitting a written opinion. Your advice should also deal with the constitutionality aspect of the said bill.

Thanking you for your kind attention to my request, I remain,

Yours truly,

Maurice Bourget,
Deputy Chairman.

Re Bill S-5, An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft

Dear Senator Bourget:

In your letter of February 21, 1975 to Mr. F. E. Gibson, Director, Legislation Section, you inquired as to the possibility of the Committee on Transport and Communications amending Bill S-5 without violating the terms of the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft signed at Geneva on the 19th day of June, 1948. You also requested a reply providing an opinion as to the constitutional aspect of the bill, i.e., an opinion on the authority of Parliament to enact legislation to give effect to the Convention.

With respect to your inquiry as to the possibility of amending the bill without violating the terms of the Convention, there are undoubtedly amendments that could be made without violating its terms but each of these would have to be considered in light of the Convention. It is, in the circumstances, impossible to advise you in a specific manner without knowing the nature and scope of the proposed amendments.

The bill is based on the federal power in respect of aeronautics which arises from two well-known judicial decisions. The first is the decision of the Privy Council, in re The Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, (1932) A.C.54. The second is the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Johannesson vs the Rural Municipality of West St. Paul (1952) 1. S.C.R. 292.

As an officer of the Department of Justice and a legal adviser to the Government I am unable to give you an opinion on constitutional aspects to which you refer. Such a request should be addressed to the Minister responsible for the bill.

Yours very truly,

M. H. Pepper,
Department of Justice.

Senator Maurice Bourget,
Deputy Chairman,
Standing Senate Committee on
Transport and Communications,
Parliament Buildings.
Subject: Central Aircraft Registry Act, Bill S-5

You have requested comments on behalf of the Department of Transport in respect of the briefs and opinions expressed by the parties appearing at the Senate hearings on Bill S-5, particularly in respect of the objections made on behalf of the financial institutions.

I have been requested to point out to your committee that the principles set out in Bill S-5 have been promoted by the Department of Transport principally at the request of the Canadian Bar Association and of financial institutions interested in aircraft financing for the purpose of accommodating what was considered a public need in the area of aircraft financing. Other than that, the Department of Transport has no particular interest in Bill S-5. The failure of Bill S-5 to be passed would not in any way adversely affect the operations of the Department of Transport. In saying this, however, it is recognised that the Department of Transport is perhaps the only agency of the government which could further the bill or carry out its provisions and give effect to the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

It is noted that all the provincial Attorneys General have taken the position that the bill infringes upon property and civil rights and thus upon provincial legislative jurisdiction. Some of the provincial Attorneys General are of the opinion that the passage of the bill would create uncertainty in this particular area which would continue in the absence of a clear judicial decision. The position of the Department of Transport is based upon the opinion of the law officers of the Department of Justice that the bill is within federal legislative jurisdiction and does not unnecessarily infringe upon the provincial sphere. Although the opinion of the Department of Justice is being relied upon, it is accepted that this does not settle the law on the matter and until a court decision is taken it must be admitted that there will be uncertainty in the minds of persons registering financial interests in aircraft as to the protection afforded by Bill S-5, and they will perhaps necessarily be obliged to continue registering in accordance with provincial legislation.

The briefs from the financial agencies concerned in aircraft financing objected to the provisions of the bill upon a number of common grounds, some of which are:

- (a) that a floating charge is not provided for;
- (b) provision is not being made for interests to be registered against aircraft engines only;
- (c) that the provisions relating to seizure and sale of an aircraft are unnecessarily complicated and time-consuming.

In relation to these particular objections it must be recognised that the purpose of the bill is to comply with the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft in order that financial interests registered against aircraft in Canada will be recognised in other countries adopting the Convention. The Convention provides the rules under which recognition will be given to registered financial interests in aircraft. One of the fundamental rules is that interests be registered against an aircraft registered in a country as to nationality, that is to say it must be an identifiable aircraft registered as to nationality. The only way an aircraft can be registered as to nationality is pursuant to the Aeronautics Act, which has been held to be federal legislation. If provision in the bill was made for a floating charge or for registering an interest against engines only there is in such cases no identifiable aircraft and accordingly such interests would not come under the Convention and there would be no protection. In addition such provisions would undoubtedly infringe on provincial legislation.

Also the provisions relating to seizure and sale of an aircraft, particularly the requirement that six weeks notice of sale be given, are provisions required, by the Convention for International Recognition. If the bill provided for a shorter period of time again the protection of the Convention would be lost.

Another objection by the financial institutions was that no provision is made for parties agreeing among themselves as to priority of registered interests under the bill. This is correct but there is nothing in the bill preventing parties from changing the order of priority of registered interests, for example a prior registered interest can be voluntarily removed and re-registered at any time which would permit another interest to be registered ahead of the one which had first priority. Further there is nothing in the bill which would prevent the continuation of the common possessory lien such as can be had for hangarage or repairs to the aircraft. In such cases the aircraft can be held until payment or satisfactory arrangements made.

A further objection by the financial institutions was that once an aircraft had been seized on the security interest, it was necessary to continue with the process of applying to a court for authority to sell the aircraft and the parties concerned could not agree among themselves as to the manner in which the security interests might be satisfied. There is nothing in the bill to this effect provided there is to be no sale. We are all aware that many court actions have been commenced but very few proceed to the ultimate end provided by law, so also with the provisions of the bill. They are there to be used if necessary but there is nothing to prevent the parties having registered interests under the bill to agree at any stage to a re-financing of the aircraft and to a reshuffling of the priority of registered interests.

It should also be noted that aircraft can only be registered as to nationality in one state. Therefore, for a Canadian registered aircraft to be sold outside Canada, the registration of the aircraft in Canada would have to be cancelled. The provisions of the bill provide that this cannot be done without the consent of all those who registered their interests under the provisions of the bill. This is something that provincial legislation could not possibly provide for.

In conclusion I would like to point out that the bill was drawn principally to provide for the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft registered in Canada. Accordingly, the bill was drawn so that it would not determine the substantive rights of the parties registering interests under it but would contain the provisions which are essential to the Convention in order that rights registered under it would receive international recognition.

Counsel,
Air Administration,
Ministry of Transport.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Senator Buckwold, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, presented the committee's third report.

He said: Honourable senators, I would ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of today and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, pp. 1003-1004).

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have your permission to say a few words in explanation?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the honour to be Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. The committee has met regularly since last November. We have had 35 public meetings and we have had 29 briefs presented by a wide variety of witnesses, all of whom have had a special interest in the field of employer-employee relations in the Public Service.

● (1410)

The report presented today is an interim report. It is not a report dealing with the main substantive issues that face the nation in employer and employee relationships, and those problems that are associated with them. We are, I am sure, very aware of the urgency of improving that climate and the legislative processes that will make for a more harmonious relationship between employer and employee in the Public Service. My remarks today will in no way attempt to go into the details of the pressing and urgent issues facing the country, the government and our employees on this important subject.

I merely want to tell you that the interim report recommends some legislative action by the Government of Canada, which would in effect make the Public Service Staff Relations Board a permanent board. That is the main substance of the committee's recommendations in this interim report. The changes that are recommended are really for the purpose of dealing only with problems of administration, not with problems of policy or of a policy nature. That will come later.

At the present time, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, chaired by Mr. Jacob Finkelman, a very distinguished public servant with a highly regarded record of achievement, is submerged by the work before it. Keeping in mind that most members of the board are not there as permanent representatives but are there part time, the committee felt it was impossible for the Public Service Staff Relations Board, as presently constituted, to deal adequately with the problems it has and the decisions that have to be made.

If I might quote briefly from a comment by Mr. Finkelman about the problems of the workload of the board, he says:

The experience of the last year, and particularly of the last few months, has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is becoming increasingly difficult for the board as presently constituted to meet the demands that are made on it. If the board is to be able to perform its functions both properly and in a timely fashion, no barriers should be erected to the effective use of all the resources of the board in relation to its responsibilities. Every member of the board must expect to be, and be capable of being, fully utilized in relation to his inherent capabilities.

Let me give you an idea of the workload facing this basically part-time board. There are series of applications for certification, the details of which I will not go into; determination of membership of bargaining units; and complaints under section 20 of the act. There are also 17 questions of law or jurisdiction cases before the board concerning decisions of adjudicators. A very major workload arises from applications for consent to prosecute; that is, the institution of prosecutions against employees who have allegedly moved into the illegal strike area. There are about 2,000 of those applications now before the board. There is the problem of applications for enlargement of time; requests for review under section 25 of the act. They have several cases of managerial or confidential exclusions. This is an indication of some of the items presently under consideration by this part-time board.

The intent of the legislative changes, if the government sees fit to adopt them, would be to institute a full-time board with basically the same responsibilities, which would be able more quickly to deal with the workload it has. The committee believes this is essential almost as an emergency measure, in order to keep the work of the board current and smoothly operating during these periods of very trying employer-employee relations.

Honourable senators, this is the basic recommendation of this interim report and I hope that it is received with approval by members of this house and by the other place.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Rowe be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Perreault on the list of senators serving on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 3, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, as usual at this time I should like to summarize the work before the Senate next week, dealing first with the schedule of committee meetings.

On Tuesday the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 11 a.m. Also at 11 a.m., the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet to begin its study on the Green Paper on Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest. It is expected that the Honourable Mitchell Sharp will be a witness at this meeting. The Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will meet at 4.30 p.m.

On Wednesday morning at 9.30 the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet to study the subject matter of Bill C-60, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

On Thursday the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue its study of the Manpower Estimates, and a meeting of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is called for 11 a.m. At 3.30 p.m. the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet, and the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will probably meet that afternoon though the time has not yet been set. This meeting will be for the consideration of Bill C-19, the Two-Price Wheat Bill, and arrangements have been made to have the Honourable Otto Lang appear as a witness.

In the Senate we will proceed with the items remaining on the Order Paper, and it is expected that two bills will come to us from the other place.

Motion agreed to.

AIRCRAFT REGISTRY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Bourget for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill S-5, to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Bill S-5 has suffered a strange fate. Those of you who have read the report of the committee know that the view of the members is that this bill should not be proceeded with further at this time because of its implications on constitutional and practical levels. Moreover, all the attorneys general of the provinces have expressed reservations—even, in many cases, strong objections to the bill. It became clear during the meetings of the committee that if this bill were enacted at this time it would generate considerable confusion owing to the fact that we would then have a situation in which parallel legislation existed.

When I said that this bill had suffered a strange fate, I had in mind what happened to Bill S-9 which was introduced in 1973. That bill was initiated in the Senate, received second reading here and was referred to committee. Objections were raised along the lines of those which are the basis for the present report of the committee on Bill S-5. Those objections were discarded by the departmental officials at that time, who expressed the view that there was no problem whatever. In fact, with all due respect to Madam Speaker, who was the sponsor of Bill S-9 at that time, she said the bill would simplify the whole problem of registration of rights in aircraft. Everyone believed that that would be the case and the bill passed through committee here, received third reading and was sent to the House of Commons. In the House of Commons it received second reading, at which stage strong criticisms as to the constitutionality of the bill were expressed by some members. The bill was then referred to the House of Commons Committee on Transport and Communications. For one reason or another that committee never seemed to find the time to deal with the bill, and it finally died on the Order Paper when the session ended at the beginning of January 1974.

If memory serves me right, the bill was not reintroduced in the following session beginning in February 1974 and ending with the dissolution of Parliament at the beginning of May, to be followed by the election of July 8. However, if I am not mistaken, that very same bill, without a change, is what we were confronted with in the present session. What I find strange, honourable senators, is not so much the fact that, after such a tortuous history, the bill should have returned to us in its present form, as that, despite that experience, we should have been told by the officials of the Department of Transport that no consultation had taken place with the provinces either prior to the introduction of Bill S-9 in the session of 1973 or since the dissolution of Parliament or after the bill had died on the Commons Order Paper in that session, or since the dissolution of Parliament in May of last year.

It is quite obvious, I think, to honourable members who have attended the committee's sittings, that there are very serious constitutional and practical problems involved in this bill. I cannot understand why the government—and I am not speaking now of the present government itself, but rather of the administration—in a matter like this, after serious objections were raised, as they were, in 1973, would bring back this bill without having first attempted to solve a number of the problems pointed out in 1973. It is a purely administrative bill, with no political connotations at all, but it is an important piece of legislation, since everyone is in agreement that it would be desirable to have uniformity in Canada as far as rights in aircraft are concerned.

How is it, however, that a bill of this kind and of this importance should not have been discussed first with the provinces? I hope that the recommendation of the committee that this legislation should not be introduced before some consultation takes place with the provinces will serve as notice to the administration generally that in such matters as this, as should be obvious to anyone who has any knowledge of the problems involved in this type of proposed legislation, the subject should be discussed with the provinces beforehand.

In any event, I am very happy with the result of the work of the committee, and I am very happy that the bill did not pass in 1973, since it would then have created confusion and would really have indicated that we had been remiss in carrying out our responsibilities. Now that we have been able to protect against legal confusion, I hope the administration and the government will exercise more care in the future.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am very pleased indeed to take part in this discussion.

[Senator Flynn.]

First of all, let me congratulate the members of the Transport and Communications Committee on the steps that they have taken in respect of this measure. As Senator Flynn has pointed out, this measure has had a curious history and a curious kind of passage through Parliament.

It is difficult to understand why the obvious conflicts that exist between the federal jurisdiction and the provincial jurisdictions in respect of matters covered by this bill have not been more appreciated and understood. Like most honourable senators, I read the material that was filed with the report yesterday, including the letter from the Attorney General of Ontario, as well as the letters from the other attorneys general. The letter from the Attorney General of Ontario, however, pointed out a number of practical problems to which Senator Flynn has alluded, and which would emerge if this legislation were passed.

Honourable senators, perhaps we should remind ourselves that what is basically sought by this legislation is the provision of a central registry for aircraft. Presumably the authority to which the administration looked to base this kind of legislation on is the general authority in the Parliament of Canada to deal with aeronautical matters, but the fact is that what is proposed is the establishment of a central registry.

We should remind ourselves that under head 13 of section 91 of the British North America Act powers regarding property and civil rights reside with the provincial authority. When it comes to registration matters in respect of real estate there is no problem. In the early days of this country, when trade and commerce were mainly of a local nature, the registration of documents affecting chattels and personal property could easily be carried out under provincial jurisdiction. But today, chattels, including things as big and expensive as aircraft and rolling stock on railways, are not only in local and interprovincial trade, but in international trade as well.

● (1430)

I can see that with the requirements for capital in modern industry there should be some central registration place where documents affecting property of this kind can be registered for notice to third parties and, indeed, to the whole world, of title to chattels, personal property, "movable property"—to quote the words of the Civil Code in Quebec—of this kind. I think it is highly desirable that there should be such a thing as a central registry for this kind of property because it will facilitate the financing required in industries as big as the aeronautics industry together with its branches, and as big as the railway industry and perhaps other industries as well. But in saying that, honourable senators, I also think that some accommodation has to be worked out with the provinces so that the registration laws as they apply in each province are not going to be in conflict with the registration laws as they would apply for a central registry if such were to be established—as presumably it would be—in Ottawa.

Just a few days ago one of our colleagues, who is not here at the moment, was discussing with me a problem that arose in an organization in which he has an interest as a director. This involved a company that owns rolling stock used on railways. The company was seeking an amendment to the Railway Act to provide a central registry for their rolling stock. What they found was that when they needed capital they had to register chattel mortgages, and in certain instances they might have to register these chattel mortgages in perhaps hundreds of municipal and county jurisdictions across the country. This is an unreasonable burden to place on an industry of that kind. I can readily see, as I am sure all honourable senators can, that in respect of aircraft, where the capital requirements are so great, it is much more pressing that this kind of legislation should be developed.

Senator Flynn has really said as much as need be said about this legislation, and in rising I just wish to express the hope that when the administration looks at this legislation in respect of aircraft, it will look also at the needs related to such things as rolling stock on railways. In fact, there may well be other industries in the country where a similar situation exists. I am sure that with the cooperation of the offices of the various attorneys general across the country an accommodation can be reached whereby under provincial law and federal law in respect of registration of instruments concerning personal property, chattels and movable property, as are referred to in this legislation, there will not be any jurisdictional problem, and that this legislation can finally be placed before us with the approval and agreement of the provincial authorities as to its content.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am very pleased also to join with those who have preceded me in voicing appreciation of the work done by the committee in connection with this bill.

It was contended before the committee by some of the witnesses that this bill was merely creating a central registry, and that therefore property rights acquired under provincial legislation would not be affected by such registration. But, unfortunately, the bill goes much further than merely creating a simple registration centre. For example, honourable senators have only to refer to clause 9, and the clauses following, to see that the provisions would surely affect the rights acquired under provincial legislation.

For example, clause 9 deals with the seizure and sale of aircraft, and places a limitation of time on the application for seizure. Clause 10 deals with execution proceedings. There again there could be a very serious limitation upon those rights acquired under provincial legislation. In that respect this bill goes further than simply creating a central registry office.

Senator Choquette: It would be an information bureau.

Senator Langlois: However, it goes further than that, because it limits the application of those rights which would be so registered.

I am also in full accord with Senator Connolly's statement that there is room for accommodation. The door has been opened by the letter received from the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec, for example, in which an open invitation was extended to the federal authorities to consult with the province with respect to ways of finding some accommodation. I am sure that an exchange of views between the two governments will bring worthwhile results.

I am also in accord with the opinion expressed by other speakers to the effect that they are amazed that this was not done before this legislation was introduced in this house, originally by Bill S-9 some years ago, and now by this present bill. The preamble to the bill indicates that it is expedient that legislative provisions be made to give effect to the obligations of Canada under a treaty signed as far back as 1948. I am sure that the intervening 27 years from 1948 until now have somewhat eroded this expediency or urgency. I do not think this is a reason for not consulting the provinces with a view to reaching that worthwhile accommodation suggested by Senator Connolly.

I am in full agreement with the report of the committee, of which I am a member. I am also pleased with the careful manner in which the committee studied this matter, and went to the trouble of consulting the attorneys general of the provinces in order to ascertain their views in connection with this legislation. I, in common with other senators, was surprised to note that even the legal adviser of the department was in accord with the position we have taken. We have a letter from Mr. L. J. Shields, Counsel, Air Administration, Ministry of Transport, which expresses his accord with our views.

I am pleased to agree with my colleagues who have spoken to this important matter by saying that every effort should be made to obtain some accommodation with the various provinces in order that legislation may be drafted which will not be conducive to confusion and disagreement with the provinces in respect thereof.

This is a very important piece of legislation. Its purpose is good. I would be very pleased to see it enacted, but before that happens we must take the precaution of proceeding in the manner recommended by our committee.

Senator Asselin: Will the bill be returned to the other place?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): No, it dies.

Senator Langlois: It dies in this house.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I have permission of the Senate to make one more remark which, in essence, arises out of the reference by Senator Langlois to the preamble of the bill? In effect, it would appear from reading the bill itself that an attempt is being made to take jurisdiction because of the treaty-making power of the federal government. The treaty was agreed to in 1948.

● (1440)

It might be useful to say that back in the 1930s, when Senator Meighen and Senator Dandurand were here, a great debate took place on the treaty-making authority, and on whether or not some of the legislation based upon treaties could, in fact, be passed by the federal government, in view of the Constitution and the rights of the provinces. It was a very important debate. In those days they did not have the benefit of federal-provincial conferences which we now have. They decided that although the treaty-making power was a valid power to be exercised by the federal government, it could not be invoked to interfere with the rights conferred upon the provincial authority, under the provisions of the British North America Act and other legislation.

It is simpler today for us to see this. It is also simpler for us to see how an accommodation can be reached. This is good legislation in its intent, but it is not good in the form in which it is drawn. However, I am of the opinion that at a federal-provincial conference the difficulty can be resolved.

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I was asking myself what an engineer could say, after listening to the remarks of three of the distinguished lawyers in this chamber, except to thank them for their kind remarks and for their support.

I should like also to take this occasion to thank the members of the committee for their thorough study of Bill S-5. As honourable senators realize, it is unusual that a bill, after receiving second reading, is not proceeded with further. However, as I have said, after a complete and intelligent study in committee, we could arrive at no other conclusion than the one in the report.

I agree entirely with the remarks of Senator Flynn. I cannot understand why, in respect of a bill such as this which concerns so many interests, the officers of the department—whatever department it might be—should not have consulted with the provincial authorities. We now have to delay this bill which, as honourable senators know, is an important one for those financial and banking institutions interested in it, and for the aircraft industry in Canada.

As I said yesterday, I hope that the government, or the department concerned, after consultation with the provinces, can draft a bill that will take into account not only the views expressed respecting constitutionality but also the amendments suggested by those who were witnesses before the committee. I hope the government will draft another bill that will meet with our approval, and the approval of all who are interested in this matter.

Senator Choquette: You could engineer a whole new procedure.

Senator Bourget: With the help of good lawyers, I am always willing to try.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 81, the bill shall be removed from the Order Paper.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to say only a few words. I see that I meet with the approval of my colleague to my left. I am sure he is not the only one who hopes that my speech will be brief. Indeed, I merely moved the adjournment to provide an opportunity for my colleagues, particularly my good friend Senator Greene, to read the report of the committee and the amendments, and to understand their purport.

This session has been an exemplary one for the Senate in that we have made amendments to a number of pieces of legislation—all kinds of amendments and decisions, both substantial and technical. In the case of the previous Order of the Day—the report on Bill S-5—the decision we made was substantial. In this case it is more technical, but it shows the usefulness of a second chamber.

The government itself was very happy to have the Senate in order to correct some ambiguities in the bill. It came to us, and some amendments were suggested by the department concerned. Others were suggested by Trans-Canada PipeLines Limited, which had the opportunity of appearing before the committee, an opportunity it had not had in the other place. Thus, because the Senate exists and makes worthwhile amendments, we have a better piece of legislation.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time, as amended?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 3, at 8 p.m.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Thursday, May 22, 1975.

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service has the honour to present its Third Report, as follows:

Your committee has to date held 35 public meetings between Wednesday, November 13, 1974, and Tuesday, May 27, 1975. Twenty-nine briefs have been received and considered by your committee from a variety of interested parties; i.e., bargaining agents representing employees in the Public Service of Canada; unions representing views outside the Public Service of Canada; the Treasury Board Secretariat representing the Government as employer; employer groups in the private sector, the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and the Chairman of the Public Service Commission, personnel and labour relations specialists; university professors; and interested individuals.

Many have followed your committee's deliberations with great interest and ten supplementary briefs have been received and are undergoing careful study. Forty-three witnesses have appeared before the committee; all have been questioned at some length. Your committee has now concluded its examination of the Treasury Board Secretariat. In due course, your committee will further examine the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board in relation to recommendations made in his report to Government in April of 1974, and his further observations and recommendations contained in two supplementary reports sent to the committee in March and April of this year.

It is unlikely that the last witness will be heard before the middle of June and therefore unlikely that your committee will be in a position to provide a comprehensive and final report to the Senate and the House of Commons before the summer recess.

In his report to the Government, and with even greater emphasis in his supplementary representations to your committee, the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board has expressed concern at the incapacity of the Board, as it is now structured, to carry the burden entrusted to it. This concern is expressed in his recent representations in the following terms:

The experience of the last year, and particularly of the last few months, has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is becoming increasingly difficult for the Board as presently constituted to meet the demands that are made on it. If the Board is to be able to perform its functions both properly and in a timely fashion, no barriers should be erected to the effective use of all the resources of the Board in relation to its responsibilities. Every member of the Board must expect to be, and be capable of being, fully utilized in relation to his inherent capabilities.

Most of the witnesses before your committee urged committee members to examine the structure and functions of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and underlined the importance of eliminating delays, of providing a system of quick but fair justice.

It has become increasingly evident to committee members in recent weeks that we are faced with having to resolve immediate administrative and operational problems which if left uncorrected would undermine the collective bargaining structure in the Public Service of Canada. In addition, the committee must resolve substantive policy issues that are necessary to meet the complex needs of the parties in an evolving social climate. Your committee believes that the policy issues with which it is faced cannot and indeed should not be resolved hastily.

Your committee, however, does feel that the present administrative difficulties can be dealt with to meet urgent requirements without being prejudicial to the substantive decisions to be taken and which will form a later report. We are consequently separating the issue of the Board from the other issues and recommending in this report a proposal relating to the structure of the Board which we urge the Government to consider without delay.

In evaluating the urgency that attaches to the problem of the structure and composition of the Board, committee members are aware of the labour relations and economic environment which prevail throughout the country and which affect the public and private sectors alike, and of the consequent pressures that have already arisen. The Public Service Staff Relations Board is designed to administer the Act; e.g. to moderate disputes and facilitate agreements between the Public Service as employer and its employees. On the whole it has served the system of collective bargaining and the country well since 1967. Signs of strain began to show in the early 1970's and we are now convinced, after examining the proposals in depth and after listening with care to all who had a point of view on this issue, that it is a matter of national importance to have a Board with the capacity to deal efficiently and effectively with the third-party dimensions of the employer-employee relationship if the collective bargaining process in the Public Service is to continue to operate successfully.

We are satisfied that the part-time, multi-dimensional Board provided for in the present legislation is ill-equipped to carry the load that is now thrust upon it. We, therefore, recommend that a Public Service Staff Relations Board be constituted with responsibility for all the major third-party responsibilities in the collective bargaining relationship; i.e., embracing the roles of the present Board, the Arbitration Tribunal and the adjudicators.

Your committee considered the desirability of recommending that the language of the statute should provide assurance that in making appointments to the Board the Governor in Council would be obliged to respect the kind of composition suggested in the Finkelman Report, i.e.:

The Board should be composed of a mix of persons who have had legal training and laymen acquainted with various aspects of employer-employee relations. Some of the members should be drawn from those who have participated in collective bargaining on the side of employers and some who have participated in collective bargaining on the side of the employees.

The Government should seriously consider the advisability of endorsing the kind of "mix" which is reflected in the quotation from the report and commit itself to endeavour, in discharging its responsibility in this area, to cooperate with bargaining agents in ensuring effective "representation" on the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

Recommendations

Composition

The Government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation providing for a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman, not less than three Deputy Chairmen and such other full-time and associate (part-time) members as may be required to discharge the responsibilities of the Board.

(a) The functions and powers of the Arbitration Tribunal, the Chief Adjudicator and adjudicators should be assigned to the Public Service Staff Relations Board and discharged by members of the Board, sitting as panels or as individuals;

(b) Incorporation into a composite public member Board of the authority and responsibilities of the Chief Adjudicator, adjudicators, the Chairman and alternate chairmen of the Arbitration Tribunal will necessitate the removal of the review powers of the Board of the authority in relation to questions of law and jurisdiction presently vested in it.

Appointment Procedure

The Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Deputy Chairmen should be appointed by the Governor in Council. Members are to be appointed by the Governor in Council from lists prepared by the Chairman after consultation with the parties, the lists to include the names of all persons nominated by any of the bargaining agents and by authorized representatives of the employer. A retiring Chairman, Vice-Chairman, Deputy Chairman or member should be eligible for reappointment to the Board in the same or another capacity.

Tenure

The Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Deputy Chairmen should hold office during good behaviour for a specified period not exceeding ten years and should be eligible for reappointment. Members and associate members should be appointed to hold office during good behaviour for a specified period not exceeding seven years and should be eligible for reappointment. No person should be able to hold an office on the Board after attaining the age of 70 years.

Distribution of Authority and Responsibilities within the Board

The Statute should identify the Chairman as the Chief Executive of the Board and should provide for the Vice-Chairman to exercise the powers and functions of the Chairman in his absence. The assignment of authority and responsibility to the Vice-Chairman and Deputy Chairmen for specified areas of the business of the Board and the conditions attaching to such assignments should be determined by the Board.

Respectfully submitted,

Sidney L. Buckwold,
Joint Chairman.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, June 4, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I should like to call on the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to give the explanation.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, tomorrow we will commence our study of the subject matter of the bankruptcy bill, and to start with we are embarking upon a course of education with our two experts. The morning sitting may run beyond 12.30, and I thought we should get full value for the consideration we pay our experts. If they have not completed the projection that we have laid out for dealing with this subject by the end of the morning, they may be able to do so if the committee meets in the afternoon. We pay the experts for a full day anyway.

Senator Flynn: That is a compelling argument.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WITHDRAWAL OF SERVICES BY LONGSHOREMEN AT MONTREAL—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I inquire of the Leader of the Government as to the situation in the St. Lawrence, or rather in Montreal harbour, since I understand, thank God, the problem is restricted to that port?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the opportunity accorded me by the Leader of the Opposition to make a brief statement with regard to the withdrawal of services by longshoremen at the port of Montreal.

I can report that this afternoon contempt proceedings were initiated against the union involved. Charges have also been laid under the Criminal Code of Canada against the president and the vice-president of the union, and several other persons.

Proceedings pursuant to the Canada Labour Code are also being initiated against some individuals, and officials are now reviewing certain material with regard to advising the government on possible cases of intimidation.

On the issue of material suggesting intimidation, after this has been reviewed thoroughly, charges may be laid by provincial authorities.

The government is very concerned about the possibility of intimidation which would prevent workers from carrying out their duties, and to meet that possibility the National Harbours Board police and the Montreal police are cooperating to prevent intimidation of any of the workers. By way of a procedural note, let me mention that possible infractions of the Criminal Code and the Canada Labour Code will be proceeded with by agents of the Attorney General of Canada. Where strictly Criminal Code offences are involved, the agents of the provincial attorney general will have jurisdiction.

It should be made clear that agents of the federal government are bringing contempt proceedings, relying on the order of the Chief Justice made following the passage by Parliament of the St. Lawrence River Ports Operations Act, and these contempt proceedings are going forth immediately.

Dealing with individuals, the federal government relies on the Criminal Code offence relating to the contravention of an act of Parliament.

The Honourable John Munro is prepared to meet with the representatives of the union if they are not in breach of a law passed by Parliament. It is the hope of the federal government, which I think is shared by most of those who serve in Parliament, that the Port of Montreal will be open and back to normal in the very near future, and the federal government is taking the necessary action to bring about that result.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

SOURCE OF MEAT SUPPLIES—QUESTION

Senator Walker: On a less bloody but nevertheless meaty subject, would the Honourable Leader of the Government inform the house where the Parliamentary Restaurant gets its meat?

Senator Perrault: I should like to assure all honourable senators that a number of us had an excellent seafood dinner in the restaurant this evening. I shall, of course, undertake to determine the source of the parliamentary restaurant's meat supplies, and give the information to honourable senators.

IMMIGRATION

PRESENCE IN CANADA OF XAVIERA HOLLANDER AND GERDA MUNSINGER—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we have, or seem to have, the "Happy Hooker" as a Canadian immigrant and we are now welcoming back Gerda Munsinger, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if there is any implication in our immigration policy of welcoming ladies of some uncertain past, or whether we might expect a change in the situation.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators that the presence of those two ladies does not constitute a radical revision in Canada's policy.

Senator Flynn: Oh no?

Senator Perrault: I hope that my response has been conveyed in the proper fashion. I simply want to say that to my knowledge no special arrangements have been made to bring in these two individuals, but I shall have an inquiry made and it is to be hoped that I shall have an answer later this week.

Senator Walker: Could it be that they are applying to be landed immigrants?

Senator Flynn: Landing!

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 28, the debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, in my opening remarks I would like to congratulate the members of the committee who showed in their consideration in committee of this bill a great sense of responsibility. This bill, as you know, reflects within the Canadian population differences in views and opinions so profound that it was appropriate to call upon the wisdom of our institution to settle the issue in the most impartial way possible. However, that did not prevent us from realizing that there were among committee members senators of liberal stripe who were much more conservative in mind than those sitting on this side of the house.

However, I think the wisdom, the tact, the knowledge and the understanding of the chairman, Senator Goldenberg, allowed us to produce a report that was unanimous on the main issues. However, in certain regards I think it remains contentious and questionable for some of the senators who sat on the committee.

So I congratulate the chairman of the committee for his excellent report. However, with your permission, I would like to indicate certain parts of the report which I personally think are unacceptable.

As reported at page 969 of the official report, the Debates of the Senate of May 27, 1975, the report of Senator Goldenberg said the following, and I quote:

"2. Subsections 35(2) and (3) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) If, pursuant to subsection (1), the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted, but, if the court finds that the accused was in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be given an opportunity of establishing that he was not in possession of the controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking, and thereafter the prosecutor shall be given an opportunity of adducing evidence to establish that the accused was in possession of the controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking."

● (2030)

On second reading of this bill, I objected to that provision since I do not agree with the amendment, because as I stated then the accused is placed in an extremely awkward position. Furthermore, when considering the burden of proof, the onus is on the Crown to prove that he did not have the restricted drug in his possession for trafficking purposes.

Honourable senators know that the basic principle upon which our penal system is based is to the effect that the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty. It is the responsibility of the Crown to prove him guilty, and not that of the accused to prove his innocence.

The tendency shown by Parliament in recent years to reverse the burden of proof is in my view a precedent that deprives the accused of the means for defending himself.

I know that the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the burden of proof could be reversed in cases where the accused is asked to prove his innocence concerning the operation of a motor vehicle while impaired. But in most criminal cases the basic economy of our criminal law is that the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty by the Crown; otherwise, he would be refused his basic right to defend himself. With all these attempts to introduce action by amending the Criminal Code, the accused, having to prove his innocence, is made to appear as a guilty person rather than as an innocent one, as should be the case according to our Criminal Code.

A number of organizations appeared before the committee. We heard the Canadian Bar Association, the Quebec Bar Association, a number of individual lawyers from many parts of Canada. I do not believe that any of those organizations or legal witnesses did not insist on the fact that in this case also an extremely dangerous precedent was being introduced into our Criminal Code.

I hope that on third reading we can review that provision in order that the accused may be reinstated in his rights, so that he does not have to prove his innocence but that the Crown should have to prove him guilty. Otherwise, no lawyer will be able to establish a defence system in an attempt to convince the court of the innocence of the accused he is defending.

Also on page 969, clause 5—

Senator McIlraith: The page?

Senator Asselin: Page 969, clause 5.

I believe these two recommendations of the committee report deserve our complete support.

I believe that we have established a new legal right under clause 4; that is, when someone is accused of simple possession the judge will be able to resort to the provisions of section 662(1) of the Criminal Code to grant him either a parole or an unconditional release. It is true that this section has been in the Criminal Code for a long time, and on a few occasions in my own practice I have used this section and the judge decided that the accused should benefit from it.

Under the provisions of the report, a judge will then be allowed to refer to section 662, subsection 1, to grant a parole or an unconditional release to someone who pleads guilty of simple possession of cannabis sativa. This is extremely important: if the judge delivers a sentence of unconditional release, under this provision of the report the accused will not have a criminal record.

If he is granted a parole under probation, the accused, after serving his probation period, will not have a criminal record. Honourable senators, you know the consequences of a criminal record for young people who, in the past, have been accused of simple possession. There are in Canada thousands of young people who will be deprived of certain social or educational advantages because, having pleaded guilty of simple possession of cannabis sativa, they now have a criminal record. In committee—I am thinking about Senator Croll, Senator McIlraith, and my colleague, Senator Neiman—we discussed this matter very seriously. Moreover, all bodies that appeared before us were overwhelmed by the fact that there are thousands of young people who are not aware of the provisions of the Criminal Records Act. Those youngsters are denied work on the labour market. Very often they are not allowed into university in either law or engineering precisely because they have criminal records. They do not know the procedure for getting pardon under this act. Therefore, those young people have criminal records all their lives for smoking perhaps one joint.

This is a progressive provision. This is a new law we have drafted. I hope the government will take it into account and will also attempt to apply it to other offences in the Criminal Code, especially minor offences. This provision will prevent young Canadian people, who have not trafficked in marihuana but have had perhaps one cigarette in their possession, from having a criminal record all their lives.

[Senator Asselin.]

I congratulate the committee for its decision. Furthermore, this is in line with the thinking of the Law Reform Commission presided over by Mr. Justice Hartt, who appeared before the committee and said that gradually there will be attempts to decriminalize offences in the Criminal Code. I remember quite well Mr. Justice Hartt saying at a public hearing that when the commission makes its recommendations, the judge will have the alternative of fining an accused—retaining our formula in order to prevent imprisonment.

● (2040)

If I remember well, I asked him what was the alternative. Well, it might be to condemn those who are unable to pay the fine to carry out public works in a municipality or to work for the charitable organizations of their district instead of sending them to prison. I say that more and more, according to the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission, some offences coming under the Criminal Code will no longer be considered a crime precisely because it has been proven in the past that prison sentences did not best serve the ends of justice for the individual and for society. Therefore, I heartily endorse this recommendation of the report submitted by Senator Goldenberg.

Of course, I do not agree when, on page 5 of the report, the bill itself provides for a ten-year sentence for the trafficking of marihuana or cannabis sativa. I feel that some committee members meant to say: "Well, listen now, we must prove to the people that we are harsh and that we can punish trafficking in an exemplary manner because some people are reactionaries, right wing." The bill provided for ten years. They said, "We will provide for 14 years less one day." But if we have a little experience, we know that in those cases where people are sentenced to ten, fifteen or twelve years imprisonment, they are released after two or three years under the Parole Act, and I wonder once again why they wanted to add 14 years less one day.

Of course, less one day is to enable the convict who is sentenced to that term to avail himself of the provisions of section 662 (1) of the Criminal Code, which provides that the judge may grant a conditional or unconditional parole. But why not maintain the ten-year maximum in the bill? Did they try, and I will repeat it, did they try to please some segments of the population who, in a reactionary way, definitely want the crime to be punished in an exemplary fashion? And the fact is that even those who are sentenced to 14 years less one day do not stay in the penal institution or the prison for more than two or three years. Of course I would ask the chairman of the committee, or my honourable friend, Senator McIlraith, or Senator Croll, to explain more thoroughly and to tell us why they have changed that ten-year period to a maximum of 14 years less one day. Whether it is 10 or 14 years, you know, I think it has the same effect on the person who is serving the term. It is he who is going to spend 10 or 14 years in prison, and he does not care less. Why 14 years instead of 10 years, as provided by those who drafted the bill?

On page 4 of the bill now before us, Bill S-19, and this is the main objection I had raised on the report of the committee, we find the definition of "traffic". The bill says that "traffic" means:

(a) to manufacture, sell, give, administer, transport, send, deliver or distribute, (b) to offer to do anything mentioned in paragraph (a), otherwise than under the authority of this Part or the regulations.

I think that we must be consistent as regards the principle of this bill. When it was introduced for second reading, we did not say we would reduce the penalties, but that cannabis sativa, hashish and marihuana were now under the Narcotic Control Act, which is an act concerning hard drugs and a very severe one. We said that, without liberalizing the law, we were going to transfer this section to the Food and Drugs Act. Under this act, penalties may be lower and we will try to depersonalize, if I may use that term, the offences in connection with cannabis sativa under the Food and Drugs Act.

I think that principle is one of the basic principles that were behind the changes made to Bill S-19.

Therefore, if we look at the definition which appears on page 4 of Bill S-19, it is the same definition which can be found in the Narcotic Control Act. The definition of "traffic", in the Narcotic Control Act, chapter N-1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, Volume 5, reads as follows:

● (2050)

"traffic" means—

Those senators wishing to follow my argument might look at the same time at the definition I gave of the word "traffic" in Bill S-19. So, the Narcotic Control Act says:

"traffic" means

(a) to manufacture, sell, give, administer, transport, send, deliver or distribute, or

(b) to offer to do anything mentioned in paragraph (a) otherwise than under the authority of this Act or the regulations.

The terms are copied exactly from the definition of the word "traffic" in the Narcotic Control Act, while the basic principle of the bill was to remove the provision concerning cannabis sativa from the Narcotic Control Act and bring it under the Food and Drugs Act. The same definition as appears in the Narcotic Control Act is retained in Bill S-19. If you look at the definition in the Food and Drugs Act, you will find the definition of "traffic" in Parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act, sections 33 and 40, as follows:

[English]

"traffic" means to manufacture, sell, export from or import into Canada, transport or deliver, otherwise than under the authority of this Part or the regulations.

Under section 2:

"sell" includes sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, have in possession for sale, and distribute.

Senator Choquette: But not "give."

Senator Asselin: Not "give."

[Translation]

The word "give", the verb "give", was kept in Bill S-19. As I said earlier, the definition in Bill S-19 of the term "traffic" is the same as in the Narcotic Control Act, which says "to manufacture, sell, give", whereas the definition of the term "traffic" in the Food and Drugs Act, which I just mentioned, does not have that meaning.

I therefore say we were inconsistent with respect to the basic principles of this bill. Maybe I am repeating myself when I say that since the Narcotic Control Act was unduly severe, we were going to transfer that provision of the bill into the Food and Drugs Act. But as far as the definition is concerned, the same strict definition contained in the Narcotic Control Act is retained.

Now, honourable senators, I think I would have readily accepted to have the very same definition of the word "traffic" in Bill S-19 as in the Food and Drugs Act. I would have been entirely in favour of that definition, and then I would have said that the committee and the Senate were consistent with respect to the basic principles we mentioned when that bill was introduced. But since no such correction was made and I find that if we keep the word "give" in the definition of traffic, we shall cause unjustifiable prejudice to those who might be caught passing a joint to someone else. That is not selling because, in my legal mind, when you are trafficking, it is for trade purposes, it is to make profits. And if you look at the definition in Bill S-19, it says "give". What does "give" mean? That means that any of our sons one night could go to a party where marijuana cigarettes are circulating. Police may rush in and catch them and then they will be charged with trafficking as that is the definition contained in Bill S-19. When handing cigarettes to each other, those people were not trafficking. They did not trade. They did not make profits. I would say that that could cause very serious damages, especially if the police officer happens to feel overzealous that night and uses the law for blackmailing.

Honourable senators, I will give you an example. Let us say that the son of a company chairman, or of a senator, a member of Parliament or a minister—Senator Lamontagne is looking at me—should hand or "give" a cigarette to someone and be caught by the police. Under the definition contained in Bill S-19, he has "given" a cigarette and instead of being charged with simple possession, if the officer is overzealous and wants to blackmail, he could charge him with trafficking under Bill S-19. We know then all the consequences. We say it will not happen. Or you are driving on a highway at 65 miles an hour, where the speed limit is 60. An officer sees you driving at 65 and he ignores you. But, another one will say: "I take my job seriously; I intend to do my duty, I look for promotions. And this is an interesting catch, a senator, a member of Parliament or a company president speeding at 65 miles an hour, when he should be going 60." So, he gives you a ticket.

Then, I think that the word "give" is not appropriate in this legislation. Therefore, at the report stage, I would like to introduce an amendment. I have been told that, when you introduce such amendments at the report stage, you need to move an amendment to return the bill to the appropriate committee for consideration. Others will say that an amendment may be moved on second reading, that is to say at the report stage without sending it back to the committee. I asked some experts to study the situation, and I have here a list of authorities which permit me to put forward a motion of amendment to amend a report presented to the Senate. I will not quote all these authorities, as this issue is not questioned. This point was questioned at one time because a point of order had been raised, as I said earlier, in May of this year, and the Chair did make a ruling, I think, to clear up the situation. I would like to recall some precedents which, in the course of the history of the Senate, occurred and where we have been allowed to amend a report from the committee when it was presented to the house. Senator Lamontagne is nodding. Then, if everyone is in agreement, I will not bother with the precedents I was provided with, but I believe Senator Lamontagne is right, and so is Senator McIlraith.

In May 1975 Senator Lamontagne did present an amendment to a report.

Senator Lamontagne: Not necessarily as authorities?

Senator Asselin: No, not necessarily as authorities, but when you introduced your motion for amending the report—

Senator Flynn: Only when needed.

Senator Asselin: Yes, only when needed, at the report stage, there were amendments, and I remember that Senator McIlraith also introduced an amendment when the Senate Committee on Agriculture submitted their report. The schedule to one of our rules was invoked to confirm that it was not acceptable at this stage, and that the report had to be referred back to the committee. Following the arguments put forward by Senator McIlraith and also by Senator Grosart, Madam Chairman ruled that at the report stage a motion for amendment could be introduced. So, if all my colleagues opposite—

Senator Flynn: There is no point of order.

Senator Asselin: If all my colleagues opposite are in agreement, I will now move the motion which I have drafted and which reads as follows, in English and in French:

● (2100)

[English]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Asselin: I move, seconded by Senator Choquette, that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19 be amended to include the following:

9. Page 4, line 22: Strike out the word "give".

[Translation]

I just moved, seconded by Senator Choquette, that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19 be amended to include the following:

9. Page 4, line 22, strike out the words "to give".

But, before concluding, if my honourable friends opposite are reluctant to vote for the amendment, I must say that I would agree that the definitions I gave earlier of the words "traffic" and "sell" under the Food and Drugs Act be replaced by the definition of traffic as provided for in Bill S-19. I am ready to withdraw my amendment, but, up to now, I officially move this amendment. I hope I have given sufficient reasons to show the consequences of keeping in the definition of traffic the words "to give". I hope that my colleagues will review seriously this matter and that when we vote, we shall vote to protect today's society and youth from the increasing problems they are facing, as well as the serious crises this definition can involve if we keep the words "to give".

Senator McIlraith: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I wish to deal with the first point raised in his argument tonight, where he was dealing with the onus of proof after there has been a finding by the court that the accused was in possession of cannabis. I may have misunderstood because I was listening to the English interpretation while the honourable senator was speaking in French, but I understood him to argue that it was up to the Crown to prove the accused guilty, and that the accused was presumed to be innocent until proven guilty—which, of course, is fairly elementary.

Would the honourable senator not agree, however, that the clause he was dealing with respecting the shifting of the onus, would have no effect until after the court had made a finding that the accused was in possession and, therefore, guilty of an offence? The only question that would then remain would be as to which offence—that is, whether it is the offence of possession, or the offence of possession for the purpose of trafficking—so that his argument that the person is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty would not apply.

Would the honourable senator not agree that the shifting of the onus only comes after a finding by the court that the accused is in possession?

Senator Flynn: It is a question of argument.

Senator Asselin: I have not understood at all the way in which Senator McIlraith has explained my viewpoint on this question. If somebody is caught in possession of marihuana, he has to prove before the court that he was not in possession of the marihuana for the purpose of trafficking. The onus is on him to prove before the court that he did not obtain possession of the marihuana for the purpose of trafficking, but simply for his own use. This is what I understood.

When we heard the testimony before the committee of various people, especially those from the Bar Association of Quebec and the Canadian Bar Association, I think Senator McIlraith will recall that those organizations were against placing the onus on the accused to prove that he did not have possession of this material—hashish or marihuana—for the purpose of trafficking. They said that this is contrary to the basic principles of our criminal law. An accused is innocent as long as the Crown has not proven him guilty. That is the main point that I tried to make tonight. I hope honourable senators understood me.

I said that the onus is on the accused to prove his innocence—

Senator McIlraith: Not to prove his innocence—

Senator Asselin: —or rather, to prove that it was not for the purpose of trafficking. However, the result is the same. If he is accused of having simple possession he has to prove that he did not have this material in his possession for trafficking. This is the onus that is put on the accused, and the Crown has to prove that he is guilty. This is the reverse onus.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtte, that this report be now adopted.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Choquette, that this report be not now adopted but that it be amended by adding thereto the following amendment:

9. Page 4, line 22: Strike out the word "give".

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

On motion of Senator Manning, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of operations under the Fisheries Development Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 10 of the said Act, Chapter F-21, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Final Communiqué issued following the Heads of State and Government meeting of the North Atlantic Council held at Brussels, May 29 and 30, 1975.

THE ECONOMY

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 10, 1975, I will call the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy. I wonder if I could be allowed to explain briefly why I am giving this notice?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Are you going to move over to this side?

Senator Lamontagne: In drawing the attention of the chamber to the state of the Canadian economy, my intention is to present my own assessment of this situation, together with some other background information, and to indicate what should be, in my view, the general orientation of monetary and fiscal policies during the fiscal year 1975-76. In other words, I hope to launch a pre-budget debate.

The Senate does not have a formal debate on the budget speech. I do not regret this because I have noted over the years that such a debate in the other place was rather sterile and too partisan. I believe, however, that honourable senators should have the same privilege as many private groups to present their views and suggestions to the Minister of Finance before he finalizes his speech on the budget. On such important occasions, I feel that the Senate should become a place for sober first thought. In this way we could perhaps have some influence on the content of the budget itself and also provide a better framework for the debate which will follow its presentation in the other place. For these reasons I hope that many senators will participate in the discussion which I intend to initiate next Tuesday.

FLORIDA LAND DEALS

ALLEGED SWINDLE—INVOLVEMENT OF CANADIANS—QUESTION

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, recently we read in our newspapers of what may be the largest land swindle in the history of the United States, involving 30,000 to 80,000 people and up to $1 billion in lost investments.

● (1410)

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if it is known whether Canadians have been victimized in this swindle. If so, what is their number and what are the amounts of money involved?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, certain press reports have indicated that some Canadians have been victimized by this alleged swindle. However, I will take the question as notice, because it may be difficult to ascertain any details relating to the alleged fraud, or whether in fact a fraud has been perpetrated in part through Canadian channels. I shall obtain whatever information is available.

VISITORS TO PARLIAMENT

ABATEMENT OF NOISE IN PRECINCTS—QUESTION

Senator Heath: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if anything can be done to reduce the noise caused by visitors to our Parliament Buildings. As you know, this is a time when many students come to see the Parliament Buildings and listen to the heartbeat of Canada. Naturally, this is a terribly exciting thing for them to do and we are happy that they come here; but perhaps before they begin their tour of the buildings they could be instructed that because this is a place where the "great legislators do their deep thinking," they must move quietly and respectfully. I am sure that would have the effect of making their visit an even more dramatic experience for them and it would certainly help us accomplish our work. Even with closed doors it is sometimes hard to hear oneself think under present conditions. Can anything be done about this situation?

Senator Perrault: I am sure the honourable senator's question will be given careful consideration by all honourable senators.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

SOURCE OF MEAT SUPPLIES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in answer to the question posed by Senator Walker yesterday, I have made inquiries regarding the source of meat for the Restaurant of Parliament.

I am pleased to give the house the following information: The administration of the restaurant purchases all meat from well-known and respected companies. The list is as follows: Canada Packers, Burns Foods, Schneiders Ltd. and Lester's Foods Ltd. I am informed that the latter company, Lester's Foods Ltd., supplies weiners, smoked meats, corned beef and ox tongue to the restaurant, while the first three companies listed supply other meats.

Resources of the Department of Agriculture, I have been informed, are used to make sure that all meat purchased is of the finest quality. Further protection is provided by virtue of the fact that three qualified butchers are employed by the Parliamentary Restaurant and only federal government approved meat is ever bought and used there.

Senator Walker: That explains why it is par excellence.

Senator Perrault: I think honourable senators will agree that we are well served by the Parliamentary Restaurant.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

IMMIGRATION

PRESENCE IN CANADA OF XAVIERA HOLLANDER AND GERDA MUNSINGER—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, last night Senator Molson asked me a question about two ladies who are alleged to be in Canada at the present time.

With respect to Xaviera Hollander, let me give the following brief outline: The federal Department of Manpower and Immigration designated Miss Hollander a person in the "prohibited" category, and an order for deportation was made. Miss Hollander appealed this designation and deportation order and the case was heard. It is now awaiting a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. That being so, it would not be appropriate for me to comment further at this time.

Senator Flynn: Can the honourable senator indicate the ground of appeal?

Senator Perrault: I am not in a position to state what the basis is of Miss Hollander's appeal for a reversal of the departmental order.

Senator Molson: No underlying information?

Senator Perrault: With regard to Gerda Munsinger, my information is that she is in Canada as a person in the "tourist" category, and is subject to the same rules and regulations that apply to all other tourists while they are in Canada.

Senator Asselin: She is no longer a security risk.

Senator Walker: She never was.

Senator Manning: Could I ask a supplementary question of the Honourable Leader of the Government? Could he tell us how much, if any, of the taxpayers' money is being used by the CBC to provide a national forum for these two characters while they are in Canada?

Senator Perrault: I will have to take that question as notice, of course, and I shall endeavour to obtain from the corporation the figures that the senator has requested.

Senator Flynn: That is a very good question. It all depends upon whether you have to pay for that kind of entertainment or not.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED—THIRD READING

Senator Petten moved third reading of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, as amended.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, with the consent of the house I have a short technical amendment which I would like to move at this time.

In amendment, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Greene, P.C., that the bill be not now read the third time, as amended, but that it be further amended as follows:

Page 2: Strike out lines 25 and 26 in the French version and substitute therefor the following: "ou pour utilisation comme combustible de soute ou d'aéronef à"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald, that this bill, as amended, be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Greene, P.C., that the bill be not now read the third time, as amended, but that it be further amended, as follows:

Page 2: Strike out lines 25 and 26 in the French version and substitute therefor the following:

"ou pour utilisation comme combustible de soute ou d'aéronef à"

It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, the Department of Justice simply forgot to amend the French version to correspond with the English, and this is purely a technical amendment to tidy up the bill.

Senator Flynn: I am very glad to hear that the Department of Justice admits it can make errors. This is the first time I have noticed such an admission. It has never been the case in committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, shall the main motion, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read the third time and passed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT
NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF
COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion, in amendment, of Senator Asselin, to the motion of Senator Goldenberg, for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, when the house rose last evening, Senator Asselin had just proposed an amendment to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, proposing a further amendment to Bill S-19.

● (1420)

When Bill S-19 was originally introduced, concern was expressed in this chamber, and among various segments of the public across Canada, as to the purpose and the wisdom of what the bill proposed. The bill, of course, had two main features, the transferring of control of cannabis from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act, and it also provided a modification of the penalties relating to possession of and trafficking in cannabis.

I was one who expressed concern at that time, but together with other senators felt it was a desirable thing that a bill dealing with a subject of this kind should be studied in detail by the appropriate committee of the Senate. It was my hope that the evidence produced before that committee would underscore in the minds of all the growing seriousness of the drug subculture and lead to more stringent efforts to reduce the damage which is being done, particularly to so many of the young people of our country. I regret that the committee's recommendations seem rather to tend in the opposite direction. We are all aware that the public, rightly or wrongly, interpreted this legislation as a lessening of concern as to the seriousness of possessing or trafficking in soft drugs such as cannabis.

The committee's recommendations, I am afraid, will be interpreted as a confirmation of that impression. I realize that the committee—

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I regret to interrupt Senator Manning, but the question before the Senate is the amendment. Although I agree that one can relate to that amendment some of the comments that we have heard, I think it would be more appropriate to discuss the problem of voting for or against the amendment. The amendment will merely have the effect of further amending the bill by taking away the word "give" from the definition of trafficking. I think we would want the Senate to discuss this very restricted point, and to vote on it. If we want to revert to the whole report, that would be all right at a later stage, but at this time it seems to me that Senator Manning is really discussing the report as a whole and not the amendment made by Senator Asselin. I know we very seldom experience problems with permitting a senator to deal with both matters, but I think in the present case it would be more in the interest of the Senate as a whole for each speaker to deal with the amendment only and then later, if necessary, revert to the subject matter of the report.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I submit that it is not really possible to deal with the amendment only, which in fact relates to one portion of the bill. It may well be that Senator Manning will wish to deal with the amendment finally, so I suggest that he should be allowed to give us the background since it may be necessary for him to discuss the whole bill in order to do so. The amendment is a narrow and restricted one, but is very important in that it has to do with penalties. But until such time as Senator Manning reaches this particular point, I think he must be permitted to discuss the report as is.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Manning says that is what he intends to do, that is all right. However, I doubt it very much and I know that if Senator Manning is allowed to speak of the other amendments to the bill or to the substance, as he has been doing, it will be impossible to restrict someone such as Senator Croll and keep him from being irrelevant, as he so often is.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I would support Senator Croll's position for the reason that I think we are really discussing the entire substance of the bill. I am very interested in the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin. If honourable senators can appreciate all that we are endeavouring to do by means of the report itself, it might be helpful to all when we decide on this one amendment proposed by Senator Asselin.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, would it not be reasonable to ask Senator Manning if he intends to confine himself largely to the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin? Otherwise, I must take the same position as the Leader of the Opposition, that this is not a discussion of the report as a whole but of the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin.

Senator Manning: Speaking to the point of order, if I had been permitted to continue you would long since have found the connection between what I am saying and the amendment before the house. The reason I was discussing the broader context is that this amendment deals with the section having to do with the penalty for trafficking. It makes a further amendment to a clause on which a recommendation for amendment has already been made in the report of the committee, and I find it extremely difficult to divorce one from the other.

I will be guided by your ruling, Madam Speaker.

Senator Flynn: No, I withdraw my point of order in view of the assurance given by Senator Manning. That is all I wanted, a warning signal. I am quite sure that is what Senator Croll also wanted.

Senator Croll: That is correct.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I had stated that the public would infer from the report and the recommended amendments by the committee—and the same applies to the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin—that this whole matter of soft drugs is really not as serious as a great many in this country tended to believe. I was pointing out that the committee will undoubtedly argue that that conclusion is not just justified and they would point to the fact that the maximum penalty for trafficking has been made more severe in the recommendations contained in their report than that contained in the original bill. In fact, the penalty for trafficking has been increased from 10 years to 14 years. However, in considering this matter the comparison really should not be made between the amendment which is now before us and the original bill or the amendments recommended by the committee. Rather the comparison should be made between the provisions of the law which presently apply and these proposed amendments. Under the Narcotic Control Act the penalty for trafficking can be life imprisonment. So, when we talk of an amendment increasing the penalty from 10 years to 14 years less one day, let us not lose sight of the fact that as compared to the existing situation we have actually reduced the penalty from life imprisonment to a term of imprisonment of 14 years less one day.

The amendment proposed by Senator Asselin further circumscribes the penalty for trafficking by removing from the definition of trafficking the word "give." I submit that the word "give" was placed in the statute in the first place for a very valid and, it seems to me, obvious reason. If trafficking in any drug is to be limited to cases in which the drug is sold for commercial gain, then a trafficker supplying a controlled drug to another person would have an easy out if charged by claiming that he was not selling the drug but simply giving some of the drug to a friend. Later, he could very easily collect whatever he intended to charge by the threat of cutting off supplies or by intimidation, blackmail, or any other method which the criminal element is quite prepared to use.

● (1430)

The question of whether a man gave or charged for a drug in a case of trafficking, or if the incident was a minor matter such as that mentioned last evening where one person might give a marihuana cigarette to another, is something which surely should be left for the court to decide. But to eliminate the word "give" from the definition of trafficking would, I suggest, provide a dangerous loophole for the criminal element and would further tie the hands of law enforcement officers whom we hold responsible for stamping out trafficking. For this reason I cannot support the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin. Frankly I feel the same about reducing the maximum penalty for trafficking.

I believe that most honourable senators and the public agree that trafficking in any form of controlled drug is very serious. In a sense it amounts to an indirect form of manslaughter, for certainly many lives have been destroyed by drugs, leading to suicide, or to the complete destruction of the mind and body.

At present we hear a great clamour for the control of guns. I suggest that drugs are far more dangerous to young people and to society as a whole than guns have ever been, and if it is fitting and proper that we control a weapon which may be used for manslaughter or murder, surely it is equally our responsibility to impose the most stringent controls on a traffic which we know from experience results in the loss of many lives, including the lives of a great many young people who may still be living but whose minds have been blown and whose prospects for meaningful life have become very dim. For this reason I submit that the provision of life imprisonment is not too severe a penalty for anyone convicted of trafficking in any of these drugs.

In connection with clause 50(2), there is a recommendation which removes the minimum penalty of three years in the case of conviction for importing or exporting cannabis. Surely if there is an argument for removing the three-year minimum penalty—

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It is quite obvious that Senator Manning, despite his assurance, is now discussing other provisions in the report. I would have no objection, except that we are likely to confuse the questions before the Senate. The question now before the Senate is the amendment moved by Senator Asselin, which has no relation to the penalty provided for trafficking. Senator Manning has expressed the view that we should retain life imprisonment for this offence, but that has nothing to do with the amendment moved by Senator Asselin concerning the definition of trafficking. Senator Manning is now dealing with another matter not related to this question. It may be convenient for him to speak at this time on other problems raised in the report, but it may not be as convenient for the rest of us.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order, the purport of the amendment of Senator Asselin is to remove the word "give" from the definition.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is so.

Senator McIlraith: The thrust of the amendment removing the provision for a minimum penalty is to enable the judges, in dealing with cases of young persons charged only with giving someone a cigarette—

Senator Asselin: Are you speaking to the point of order?

Senator McIlraith: I am addressing myself squarely to the point of order raised.

Senator Flynn: "Squarely" may be a bit exaggerated.

Senator McIlraith: Well, whatever opinion my honourable friend has of my argument, or what I have to say, I would remind him that I listened respectfully to what he said and, I hope, considered it responsibly. Whether I am right or wrong, I wish to put forward my opinion respecting the point of order he raised, and I believe I have that right.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator McIlraith: The point is that the thrust of the amendment is to remove the word "give" from the definition. One of the reasons given for the removal of the minimum penalty provision—that is, the three-year minimum penalty—was that there would be, or could be, cases before the courts involving some young person who has simply given a cigarette, or a joint, as it is called, to a friend, and the minimum penalty of three years would be too harsh in such cases.

It is impossible to discuss separately the removal of the minimum penalty and the removal of the word "give," because the removal of the minimum penalty is to cover, among other things, cases of where a young person simply gives a cigarette, and it is nothing more than a "giving" in the ordinary sense of the word. The two are inextricably linked, and there is no way, to my mind, that one subject can be discussed without raising the other. The two points are in conjunction with each other.

Senator Flynn: The argument being put forward by Senator McIlraith was put forward by Senator Manning before he discussed the question of retaining the sentence of life imprisonment for trafficking. It was clear from Senator Manning's remarks that he was not relating this to his contention that we should not have lowered the maximum penalty, but should have retained the penalty of life imprisonment as provided presently under the Criminal Code. He did not relate that to Senator Asselin's motion in amendment. Senator Manning was addressing himself to the straight question of what kind of penalty should be imposed for trafficking—whether we define it as it is defined in the report of the committee, or whether we define it in accordance with the motion in amendment. Senator McIlraith knows that very well.

If it is the wish of the Senate to debate these two points simultaneously, so be it, but in the interests of an orderly discussion, it is my opinion that the amendment should be discussed separately.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I sat through about 90 per cent of the committee hearings, and I cannot conceive of any member of this house being able to vote on the amendment without that necessary background. The amendment must be viewed in light of why it is being proposed. The amendment is being proposed for a specific purpose, and can only be understood in light of that purpose. The amendment is proposed to deal with the minimum penalty in the bill for trafficking. It must be discussed in that light, following which, in due course, it will be voted on, and we will have covered the whole subject.

Senator Flynn: That's it!

Senator Croll: Well, we will understand it.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, prior to coming to this chamber I was accustomed to a legislative procedure where a very strict line was drawn between debating an amendment, and debating a motion, or a motion in amendment. However, in the five years I have been in this chamber, I think this is the first occasion on which anyone has insisted on retaining those narrow confines for debate. I am quite prepared to speak to the specific amendment and then speak about the other points in the report of the committee.

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: If you cannot do it, why do it?

Senator Manning: That has not been the practice followed in this chamber. I think it makes for a great deal of repetition, which can be avoided when we are talking about subjects as closely interrelated as this amendment and the report of the committee. I am quite prepared to leave the other part until later in the debate. I assume the fact that I have spoken on the amendment will not deprive me of the privilege of speaking on the final motion.

I will conclude by making this one further observation, which does relate to the subject of the amendment. I have indicated the reason why I feel it is very unwise to remove the word "give" is because it would give the criminal element a loophole of escape if they can claim that they were simply giving the drug instead of selling it, thereby making it more difficult for law enforcement officers to enforce whatever penalties are provided for those who are engaged in trafficking.

In weighing the seriousness of trafficking and what the penalties should be, it should be borne in mind that the danger of cannabis is not primarily in itself. It is a soft drug, not a hard drug. It cannot be compared in its damaging effects to hard drugs. But the danger is that for thousands of young people these soft drugs are the threshold, the door, to the drug subculture of our times, which certainly is one of the greatest menaces to young people today, and one of the worse blights on our modern permissive society. My claim is on the dangers of the use of cannabis trafficking in Canada, and the penalties that attach to trafficking must be viewed and assessed in that context. I would be opposed to eliminating the word "give" for the reason I have indicated, and for the same reason I am also opposed to the other amendments, which I will discuss later on when the bill as amended is before the house.

Senator Flynn: You can do it very well then.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, this would appear to be an appropriate time to speak to the amendment moved by Senator Asselin. I am reserving my right to speak to the other points raised by Senator Manning when the main report is discussed.

In spite of the careful and scholarly way in which Senator Asselin presented his argument, I must honestly say I think it regrettable that his amendment, and the reasons therefor, have no consideration for the evidence that was heard by the committee. Believe me, the committee did not arrive at a decision to leave the word "give" in the definition of trafficking, without having heard a number of witnesses and thought about it very carefully.

I would remind honourable senators that the committee took four months in considering this matter. I have here the statistics. There was a total of 30 meetings—21 public meetings and nine in camera meetings. There was a total of 52 witnesses heard. They were of the highest possible calibre, and of all kinds and shades of opinion. They were not all hard-liners and not all soft-liners; they were of all shades of opinion. The committee also received a total of 60 briefs and submissions in writing. After all that work—I am speaking strictly to this one point—the committee decided to include the word "give" in the definition of trafficking.

Let me reduce to very plain terms our reasons for concluding that this word must stay in the definition. Everybody conjures up the thought that "give" connotes the giving of a "joint" to a friend, and it is said, "Ah, that is not trafficking." The great difficulty is that the giving may do two things. First, the giving may be a very deliberate act, intended to start the individual receiving this minor gift on the path of becoming an addict. Secondly, somebody who gives one, two, five or ten "joints" to another person may five minutes later, or the next day, collect a substantial sum from that person for having given him the "joints". You can see the potentialities open to a lawyers defending a charge involving this definition if the word "give" is not present.

Also, please bear in mind—and the evidence was overwhelming in this respect—that under no circumstances, in a case of one friend giving a "joint" or two to another, would there be a charge of trafficking laid; it would be a charge of mere possession. It sounds out of place to have "give" in the definition but, unfortunately, unless it is in there are no means of catching in the net those persons who give for an ulterior motive.

Believe me, we have to leave some discretion in the laying of charges with the prosecutors, who I am sure would be discreet under these circumstances, and would never lay a charge of trafficking for a mere handing of one or two cigarettes to a friend. Even supposing a prosecutor had the nerve to lay a charge of trafficking under those circumstances, can you think of any judge who would ever convict of trafficking? Of course not. He would convict of mere possession.

Honourable senators, in view of the discussion this afternoon, I felt I was left with no alternative but to make absolutely clear the amount of work done by the committee on this matter, the consideration given to it and the reasons for arriving at that conclusion.

Senator Hicks: If I understood the honourable senator correctly, he said that numerous assurances were given that under no circumstances would there be a prosecution in respect of the giving of one or two cigarettes by one friend to another.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Walker: He did not say that.

Senator Laird: I did not say "assurances."

Senator Hicks: I did not see how anyone could give such assurances, because we rely upon the discretion of prosecutors from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia, who may have all sorts of different attitudes towards the laying of criminal charges.

Senator Choquette: He did not say that.

Senator Laird: You are quite right in saying that there may be different attitudes, but the evidence shows that this has not been done. I am sure the honourable senator has confidence in the integrity of the Bench, as I have, and knows that under no circumstances would there ever be a conviction for trafficking in a case of one friend simply handing a "joint" to another.

Senator Flynn: The court would have no choice.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I think I should at this point speak to this amendment.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Grosart: You have already spoken.

Senator Neiman: I, too, am a member of the committee that considered this matter in detail, and, with respect, I feel I have to dissociate myself to a certain extent from some of the statements just made by my good friend and colleague, Senator Laird.

This point was discussed in great detail, and was of some concern to us during the course of our deliberations, because of the definition that was used. As Senator Asselin said, the definition now in Bill S-19 is taken from the Narcotic Control Act. It is there for a good reason, which we do not have to consider further today. The fact is that the control of cannabis is to come under the Food and Drugs Act, and that consideration should be foremost in our minds. In the Food and Drugs Act there is another definition of "trafficking", which is almost identical, in effect if not in wording, to that in the Narcotic Control Act, with the sole exception of this word "give."

● (1450)

Instead of adopting the definition of "trafficking" that is in the Food and Drugs Act, and is now applicable to both Parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act which cover restricted and controlled drugs, the drafters of Bill S-19 chose to import the definition from the Narcotic Control Act.

All Senator Asselin's amendment does, in effect, is delete this one word. As I say, we had many discussions about this during the course of our hearings and it was of some considerable concern to us—for the very reasons that Senator Laird has just enunciated. We were told that the police would not lay a charge of trafficking in instances of the giving of one or two cigarettes. They stated that to us categorically; they wanted to leave the word in there, but at the same time they said they would not use it. That appears to me to be a little inconsistent and ridiculous. If they are not going to use that definition, what is that word there for?

If I may give you this again, the definition in the Food and Drugs Act is:

"traffic" means to manufacture, sell, export from or import into Canada—

And I stop there to tell you that it is all-inclusive. In the Food and Drugs Act it includes importing and exporting, so that you do not need a separate section for those two so-called different offences. It goes on:

—transport or deliver, otherwise than under the authority of this Part or the regulations.

Section 2 of the Food and Drugs Act defines "sell" as follows:

"sell" includes sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, have in possession for sale and distribute.

I emphasize the words "have in possession."

Surely we have enough words in this definition to cover all the transactions that go on in the course of conveying marihuana or cannabis from one person to another. I am only saying that, to be consistent with the Food and Drugs Act, we should be using the same definition that is there in Parts III and IV for restricted and controlled drugs—many of which are far more dangerous, and are acknowledged to be, than cannabis, in spite of the serious reservations that all committee members have about cannabis. No member of that committee is prepared to say that this is not a dangerous drug. At the same time, we did realize that there are other drugs that are far more dangerous.

Perhaps I may be allowed to speak to another point. If you are worrying about the actual penalties that are imposed for trafficking, I have statistics here for 1974, which refer only to cannabis and to no other drugs, and they show that there were 29,067 convictions for all types of cannabis offences, of which 27,202 were for simple possession. In other words, 94 per cent of the convictions for cannabis offences were for simple possession only, leaving somewhat under 2,000 convictions for all other offences, including possession for the purpose of trafficking, trafficking, importing and exporting and cultivating.

If you are concerned about the types of sentences that are proposed in this bill, then I point out that the harshest sentences have been reserved for importing and exporting. There were 24 convictions registered in that category alone—only 24. In fact, since the statistics have been kept—there have been only two sentences awarded in eight- to nine-year range, one in 1972 and one in 1974. Those are the highest sentences which have been awarded for that offence, which is considered the most serious of all offences involving cannabis. The vast majority of the penalties were in the seven- to eight-year range. In fact, there was only one other conviction that drew a sentence in the one- to three-year range, and that was in 1973. It seems there is an almost uniform type of penalty that is awarded by our judges from coast to coast in Canada for this offence, which is considered the most serious aspect of trafficking, and that is from seven to eight years.

In fact, what the committee was trying to do was be a little realistic. The Narcotic Control Act at present allows a penalty of life imprisonment for this type of offence. The bill had proposed that it be reduced. In view of the fact that, even in our amendment today, we are recommending a penalty of 14 years less a day, we are still recommending a sentence that is far in excess of what any judge has ever awarded in Canada and probably ever will.

Honourable senators, I strongly urge you not to think that we are in any way trying to encourage the use of cannabis. We all consider cannabis to have a great potential for harm although, based on the evidence that I have heard, I simply cannot use that broad generic word "drugs" and say that all drugs are dangerous, all drugs lead to addiction. The evidence we heard was that cannabis is not addictive, although it has a great potential for harm—one that we may not even realize. But it cannot simply be thrown into the larger clause with other drugs such as speed, MBA, herion, opium and some of the other drugs that we know beyond doubt to be extremely dangerous.

Therefore, what I am saying is that on this point alone the committee was trying to be realistic. We were persuaded by the law enforcement officers—at least, some of the committee members were—that it was preferable to leave this word "give" in. I am saying that it is simply inconsistent to leave it in. As Senator Laird says, they would not use it in the sense of trafficking. To my mind, it would make the act more uniform simply to adopt the definition that is now in the Food and Drugs Act as the one for all sections, including this new Part V that we are proposing.

I have no objection to Senator Asselin's amendment as it is. I simply suggest that to use the definition that is now in the Food and Drugs Act would make all parts more consistent and more uniform, and I see no danger in adopting that viewpoint. I may say that this was a strongly argued point in committee, and there were several members of that committee who would have preferred to remove the word "give" simply for the sake of uniformity, and because of the fact that it is not used in laying trafficking charges. I thought that should be brought to your attention. I would support Senator Asselin's amendment, with the reservation, as I said, that I prefer the definition that is now in the Food and Drugs Act.

● (1500)

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, in the circumstances there are a few of us who also would have supported Senator Asselin's amendment—myself included—having regard to what he said and what has since been said. The fact is, however, that after we removed the minimum sentence the Department of Justice—and in this case Justice was right, not wrong, I want Senator Flynn to know—advised us that such an amendment would be dangerous. In my opinion, Justice made a good case, and had good reasons for making that case. In other words, while many of us were of the view held by Senator Asselin at the present time, we were nevertheless influenced by the Department of Justice which, with its great experience, asked us to be cautious and careful.

Senator Choquette: What experience have they in the Department of Justice? I hate to hear that said. Most of them have never practised for even one day in their lives. They are formulating theories all the time, but they don't know what they are talking about most of the time.

Senator Croll: Of course they do.

Senator Choquette: Oh, come on!

Senator Croll: When they appeared before us they knew what they were talking about. They had been in contact with the crown attorneys in various parts of the country, and seemed to be quite knowledgeable. At least, that was my view.

Senator Choquette: With all due respect to my friend, I can assure him—and he knows that I am telling the truth—that if the people in the Department of Justice ever had to take one of those cases they would hire an experienced lawyer from Toronto or Ottawa to handle it. They would not even know where the court is, or when to stand up or sit down.

Senator Croll: You may be quite right in the sense that they would not be able to defend a case but, nevertheless, they have knowledge of a great number of cases, and they have dealt with many crown attorneys. They made so impressive a presentation that some of us on the committee thought we ought to let the matter come forward in the way it finally did, although originally we were of the same view as Senator Asselin.

So far as I am concerned at the present time, I will let the matter stand. I believe Senator McIlraith has something to say on the point.

Senator Heath: Honourable senators, if having one extra word in the bill is a case of overkill, then I am all in favour of leaving that extra word in.

I want to tell you something I saw with my own eyes seven or eight years ago. I still recall it with horror. A young man aged about 21, I would say, was surrounded by a group of 12- and 13-year-old children who had come out of a certain junior high school. The young man was handing these children "reefers"—the marijuana joint type of thing. He was not being paid for these at all. But you can understand full well what would develop from that. Those youngsters would come back looking for him, like other children in other times gathering around the ice cream salesman.

With what are you going to charge a person like that 21-year-old who was seducing those youngsters into that type of activity? It is so difficult to nail that type of person in the first place. If you remove the word "give", what will you charge such a person with in future?

Let me add one further point. There are some countries, and Greece is one, in which persons convicted of involving a minor—that is, a person 18 years and under—in the use of narcotics, cannabis included, are given life imprisonment and a stiff fine as well.

I say keep the word "give" in the definition, and keep in anything else if it will help us nail these people.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I want to speak directly to the amendment. Before doing so, however, I will give other senators the opportunity of participating in the debate now, because I propose to move the adjournment of the debate after making a few remarks.

Senator Flynn: I would rather follow you.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, it had not been my intention to take part in this debate, but in view of the proposed amendment I feel I should.

I cannot speak as a member of the committee that studied Bill S-19, because it is not my privilege to serve on that committee. I can, however, speak with some authority as a father and a grandfather.

I cannot follow Senator Neiman's argument. If for the sake of uniformity, which she seems to think is all important, we are going to remove what in my view is one of the most significant words in the bill in terms of the distribution of narcotics, including marihuana—

Senator Flynn: The word "distribution" is in the definition.

Senator McDonald: If you will hear me out, I think you will not have an argument with regard to the word "give." I was saying that if you remove the word "give," you then remove the one word which makes it illegal for those people who push or distribute drugs, including marihuana, to advertise and sell their products.

The sellers of all products distributed in the western world use advertising of one kind or another. Most products are sold by means of advertising on radio and television, or in the newspapers and periodicals. But some products are sold on the basis of free samples used as advertising. For example, it is not unusual for the drug companies to distribute samples of drugs to doctors, dentists and hospitals for the purpose of advertising them and getting people to use those particular drugs for medical purposes.

In the case of narcotics, including marihuana, to my knowledge the only advertising available to the pusher is the give-away or free sample kind. I cannot speak from knowledge of the evidence given to the committee since, I repeat, I am not a member of that committee, but I do know that the chief form of advertising used by the distributors of drugs, including marihuana, is the give-away method, which involves the use of stooges placed in our high schools across this country whose sole purpose in life is to give joints to as many children as possible in those schools, knowing full well that, while giving one joint away may not gain a convert, giving many joints away is bound to gain some customers.

Senator Flynn: In which case you "distribute."

Senator McDonald: You give.

Senator Flynn: You distribute.

Senator McDonald: I am not a lawyer—

Senator Flynn: That is obvious.

Senator McDonald: —but I am not prepared to accept from a lawyer in this house or anywhere else that there is any other word than "give" which will describe—

Senator Flynn: Distribute.

Senator McDonald: —properly the procedure I have mentioned.

Senator Flynn: Distribute.

Senator McDonald: You can argue all you like and, if you want to take part in the debate, that is fine with me. But at the moment I want to say what I believe.

Senator Flynn: And I am just trying to keep you on the track.

Senator McDonald: I say, and I repeat, that if you remove the word "give" you then open up the field and you allow young individuals, in many cases aged 13 and 14 years, to become the advertising agencies for this drug.

We have been told that there is no evidence that marihuana is as dangerous as some other drugs. Perhaps it is not. I do not know. I have never been given evidence to tell me how dangerous marihuana is. But I do know from personal experience, personal association, that no young person ever smoked marihuana for any length of time without being medically affected by it. I am confident that anybody who has associated with young people who use this drug has come to the same conclusion that I have, and that is that it is a dangerous drug, that has a devastating effect on young people who use it over any extended period of time. I am, therefore, one of those who cannot support the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin, despite the fact that he put forward a good argument. From personal experience, however, and personal knowledge, I would never support the removal of the word "give" from this definition in the bill.

● (1510)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise to speak to the amendment, but only to show that for many reasons I cannot support it.

I was rather surprised to hear my good friend Senator Neiman support the amendment, because it is not too many weeks ago that she stood in this chamber and made the original motion to put in the particular word in question. Now she is supporting an amendment that would take it out.

Senator Flynn: It was never before this house.

Senator Bonnell: The bill came before the house on second reading, and I think it contained the word "give." The bill was sponsored by Senator Neiman.

Senator Flynn: That does not mean she was supporting every word of it.

Senator Bonnell: I do not see why she introduced it, then. Why did she not get someone else to sponsor it?

One of the reasons why I think that we, as the Senate of Canada, cannot approve this amendment is that right now across this country many people think we have gone soft on marihuana. If we take out the word "give," Canadians from coast to coast will get the impression that there is nothing wrong with the drug, and that it can be given away to anybody. Furthermore, the removal of the word "give" will mean that a person can give 50 pounds of hashish away, if he feels like it.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no.

Senator Bonnell: It can be given away, and there is no limitation on the quantity that can be given away.

Senator Flynn: Read the rest of the definition.

Senator Bonnell: The rest of the definition contains other words, but not the word "give."

Senator Flynn: It has the word "distribute."

Senator Bonnell: I know the word "distribute" is there, but I know the word "give" is there too. If I said I gave some hashish away, who could prove that I was distributing it?

I also contend that it is time we realized that this is a dangerous drug. We are only now starting to learn of its dangers to the human body. We should not, therefore, give the impression to Canadians that we have gone soft on this drug, and that it is all right to give it away.

I agree with Senator Heath, who gave an excellent example of what I mean. That is the way all young people get started today—somebody gives them a cigarette. They do not buy the first one in order to try it.

We have to show Canadian citizens that we are concerned about this drug, that we are concerned about its widespread use. For that reason I believe we must defeat this amendment, and adopt the report.

Senator Flynn: Defeat the bill, you mean.

Senator Bonnell: The amendment.

Senator Flynn: You mean defeat the whole bill.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I want to discuss the amendment to delete the word "give" from the definition of trafficking. In a few minutes I shall move the adjournment of the debate so that I can continue my remarks tomorrow—

Senator Asselin: But they will be relevant?

Senator McIlraith: Yes, I hope they will be relevant. I hope eventually to learn the Rules of the Senate better than some others appear to have learned them. However, I trust that when I am being relevant, I will not be interrupted, before I get to the thrust of my argument, by people who are trying, wrongly, to anticipate the content of the argument. The argument may be good or bad, but that is better determined after the argument is made, and not by preventing the speaker from making the argument.

Senator Flynn: I would only do that to an experienced parliamentarian; never to you.

Senator McIlraith: Good.

In any event, I want today to draw attention to one matter that I think can fairly be said was in the minds of all the members of the committee. Early in the evidence it became clear that the Narcotic Control Act deals mainly with material imported into Canada illegally by international smugglers, and distributed down from that channel, some of it being transported on to the United States from Montreal, whereas the Food and Drugs Act deals basically, with one or two exceptions, with products that are manufactured in Canada and are, in the main, perfectly legally in use in this country for medical purposes of one sort or another. In the latter act, what is illegal is not the use of the drug, or having it in one's possession—since these substances are in people's possession all over the country—but their use through other than appropriate medical channels, and other controls of that sort. There is, therefore, a wholly different concept in, and a very logical reason for, the slight difference in the language as between the two acts.

A very real difficulty arises, however—and I would be the first to admit it—in dealing with cannabis. Cannabis, while in the main, with one or two exceptions, coming into the country in the same fashion as heroin and other drugs of that type—through international criminals—is distributed at the local level with certain of the drugs that come under the Food and Drugs Act. Here we have the anomalous situation of being unable to liken it, in the techniques of its handling in this country, to the substances that fall under the Narcotic Control Act or the Food and Drugs Act. There is, therefore, a real problem there.

The committee, when it addressed itself to the point raised by Senator Asselin, had this in mind, and preferred to retain the definition used in the Narcotic Control Act, which includes the word "give," as distinct from using the definition in the Food and Drugs Act, which does not contain the word "give." The wording is slightly different, but I think I am fair and accurate when I state that that was the background and the basis on which the committee made its decision to leave the word "give" in.

I want to continue the argument, if I may, to show, I hope, the significance of the word "give" in its usage here, and also in its relationship with the removal of the minimum penalty which the committee recommended. The two are inextricably linked together, and with great deference I do not see how one can be totally detached from the other in discussion. However, I do want to pursue further the argument as to why I think the word "give" should be left in the definition. Accordingly, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Choquette: I wonder if we can be assured that when we resume the debate tomorrow one important senator who should be here will be here, namely, the chairman of the committee. Do you know if he is going to be here tomorrow?

Senator Laird: Yes, I have just received a note from him.

Senator Choquette: I would think that is one good reason for adjourning this debate.

Senator Asselin: Did you adjourn the debate for that reason, Senator McIlraith? Did you adjourn it because Senator Goldenberg will be here tomorrow?

Senator McIlraith: No, I moved the adjournment because my argument, of necessity, must be very technical, and in further explanation of what I thought was the point made by the proposer of the amendment yesterday I want to have precise references to the appropriate sections.

On motion of Senator McIlraith, debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Immigration Policy, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Perrault moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the adoption of this report may I say by way of explanation that the number of citizens' groups in all parts of Canada interested in making submissions to the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Immigration Policy is much greater than was anticipated in the earlier estimates.

As some honourable senators are aware, last week I requested that I be made a member of this committee to replace Senator Fergusson, so that I might determine for myself the way in which the committee is operating, and the burden of work facing it. I have spent a week with the committee, and I can certainly state that this is one of the most heavily occupied committees in Parliament today.

The number of briefs and submissions presented, and the almost bewildering variety of opinions expressed, makes absolutely mandatory, in my view, the extension of the time limit for the presentation of this committee's report. That is the reason for this proposal.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, the reason we are asking for permission is that the house may have an extra

COMBINES INVESTIGATION

NEW BRUNSWICK COURT OF APPEAL DECISION RE K. C. IRVING, LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator McElman, perhaps I should ask the Leader of the Government what is the intention of the Department of Justice with regard to the judgment rendered by the Appeal Court of New Brunswick in connection with the K. C. Irving conviction under the Combines Investigation Act.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice, because thus far I have received only truncated news reports about the reported decision of the Appeal Court.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion, in amendment, of Senator Asselin, to the motion of Senator Goldenberg, for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, in continuing my remarks today on the amendment of the Honourable Senator Asselin to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I shall try to be brief, and I hope I shall also be relevant.

Perhaps I should begin simply by indicating, in order to get the matter into the proper context, the way I see it in relation to the bill before us. This bill, which deals with cannabis, provides for four offences with which we are directly concerned in relation to Senator Asselin's amendment. The first one is the offence of being in possession of cannabis, clause 48.(1); the second is the offence of trafficking in cannabis as contained in clause 49.(1); the third is the offence of having in his possession cannabis for the purpose of trafficking as contained in clause 49.(2), and the fourth is the offence of importing or exporting cannabis to or from Canada as contained in section 50 of the act.

Sentences are set out, of course, in respect of each offence, and for our purposes the possession offence would be dealt with by a fine or a short term of imprisonment. Trafficking offences, importing or exporting, which are regarded much more seriously, would be dealt with, if the committee's report is adopted, by a maximum sentence of 14 years less one day. The significance of the "less one day" is, combined with the effect of removing a minimum penalty, to enable the judge in any case where a charge is laid under any of those four offences to give an absolute discharge—that new sentence that was enabled to be imposed by legislation during the last three or four years. If another part of the committee's report is adopted, it would enable that conditional or absolute discharge to carry with it the clear consequence that no criminal record shall flow from it. So, it will be seen that the whole purpose of the removal of the minimum and the changing of the maximum to make it less than 14 years is related to the change proposed by the honourable senator.

Now, coming more directly and immediately to the amendment proposed, it would be useful to read into the record the actual definition of trafficking in the bill itself. It is as follows:

"traffic" means

(a) to manufacture, sell, give, administer, transport, send, deliver or distribute, or

(b) to offer to do anything mentioned in paragraph (a), otherwise than under the authority of this Part or the regulations.

That clause which is in our bill dealing with cannabis is taken directly from the Narcotic Control Act, and is to be distinguished from the definition of "trafficking" as used in the Food and Drugs Act. I should place that on record also. It is:

"traffic" means to manufacture, sell, export from or import into Canada, transport or deliver, otherwise than under the authority of this Part or the regulations.

It will be noted that while there is some difference in wording, the significant point insofar as the amendment is concerned is that it omits the verb "give." That is the significant point so far as we are concerned today. There are other differences in the wording, but they are not germane to our discussion today.

In considering the matter of the committee report which is sought to be amended, I think it is fair to state that all members of the committee were concerned with the fact that it was technically possible for a person to be charged with importing or exporting or trafficking or being in possession for the purpose of trafficking when—and this was the example given—some young person innocently or foolishly had a "joint" and gave it to another person.

In one of the penalty sections of the bill, three years was proposed as the minimum. That was struck out. Under another section there was no minimum penalty but, because of its wording, the possibility of raising the sentence to 14 years was proposed. The court would then not have the discretion to grant a conditional or unconditional discharge as it might wish. So, in considering that type of case and as I listened to the argument of the senator in proposing his amendment, I took it that he was concerned with that element relating to persons charged with trafficking and not with the other element, the professional criminals, and so on. I believe all other senators shared that concern and we are on common ground up to that point. The committee chose to deal with it by making it possible for a judge, with respect to any of the offences I have mentioned, to deal with the accused as lightly as he wished, for the very purpose of protecting the foolish young person who might bring in a cigarette, or take one with him when leaving the country, or give it to a friend. The committee dealt with it in that manner.

Now the honourable senator is seeking to bring forward another remedy for the problem, notwithstanding the work of the committee through that part of its report and notwithstanding the attention the committee had given it and the solution they had found for the problem. In point of fact, it was given in evidence that virtually all the cases covered by the example were dealt with by a charge of possession rather than one of trafficking or being in possession for the purpose of trafficking. The evidence was that in virtually all cases that was the practice. That may not be a good enough answer, because not only theoretically but in point of fact it is possible for a student who foolishly gives a cigarette to someone else to be charged with trafficking. We knew that such a person would be adequately protected in view of the freedom of the sentencing court to deal with him as lightly as it wished, and we thought that the point had been adequately covered.

Allow me now to deal with the other type of person who could be charged with trafficking, being in possession for the purpose of trafficking, or importing or exporting. I refer to the professional drug trafficker. If we remove the word "give" from the definition of trafficking, as I have read it, we effectively enable those professional traffickers, the real traffickers who are dealing in big quantities, to escape the net leading to prosecution. The question is whether we should enable those persons to escape the net. As I evaluate the evidence before us, I do not recall anyone giving any evidence—nor do I recall any of my colleagues in committee suggesting it—that the professional trafficker dealing in large quantities for gain should be permitted to escape. It is fair to say there was a view of harshness towards them throughout—it was also common to all the witnesses—on the part of all members of the committee.

I respectfully suggest that the honourable senator's amendment, if carried, would enable such persons to escape. It would not have the practical effect of assisting a single solitary young student, because we have already provided the machinery for protecting the young, innocent student who foolishly passes a joint.

I wish to take a moment—I will try to be brief—to refer to a couple of leading cases. The honourable senator interjected on several occasions yesterday that the word "distribute", still left in the definition, would cover the word "give." That is not the case. If the honourable senator will refer to the judgment of the New Brunswick Supreme Court in the case of Regina vs. Christiansen, he will see that the word "distribute" denotes the plural operation—more than one. It clearly denotes plurality of recipients. Apart from referring to that case, perhaps I need not say more.

Senator Flynn: You are not convincing, anyway.

Senator McIlraith: The case is there to be seen, if anyone wishes to see it. The citation is Regina vs. Christiansen, in the New Brunswick Supreme Court (Appeal Division), Criminal Reports, volume 23, page 229. I have a copy of the judgment here if any honourable senator wishes to see it.

The other case, which is really significant and helpful on the point, is that of Her Majesty the Queen vs. Ernest John Rogalsky, a decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal. In that appeal the charges were that Rogalsky did unlawfully have in his possession for the purpose of trafficking a restricted drug, LSD, contrary to the Food and Drugs Act, and that he did unlawfully have in his possession for the purpose of trafficking a narcotic, namely, cannabis, contrary to the Narcotic Control Act.

The evidence seemed to be clear and was not in dispute. What the court had to decide was whether the accused's possession in each case was for the purpose of trafficking. That was the charge—for the purpose of trafficking. The accused stated that he had bought the drugs for his own use. There was no question about his being in possession of them. He said he had bought them for his own use. He further stated that he gave them, in accordance with the etiquette—that is the word used—of the drug milieu, to other persons. In any event, the word "give" was dealt with rather fully in that case, and also the word "deliver."

After dealing with the matter at some length, the court found the accused guilty of trafficking contrary to the Narcotic Control Act, because he had given some of the narcotic to a friend, and the word "give" was included in the definition of "traffic." It found him not guilty of trafficking on the LSD charge, where the evidence was the same—the two drugs were together, side by side—because it held that, the word "give" not being in the definition in the Food and Drugs Act, the other words did not cover the handing over of the drug to another person.

● (1430)

That judgment is squarely on the point. It is quite a lengthy judgment, and I have copies here which I will be glad to provide to anyone who might wish one.

Another interesting case on this point is that of Regina vs. Jimmo. Perhaps I need not elaborate on that. It is a Quebec case, reported at 16 Canadian Criminal Cases, Second Edition, at page 396. It, too, deals with the difference between the two acts.

In any event, the purport of those two cases is that "distribute" cannot apply in a case where there is only a transfer from one person to another.

Senator Flynn: That is the point I was trying to make.

Senator McIlraith: There has to be a multiplicity. If the word "give" were deleted from Bill S-19, as the motion in amendment proposes, it would be impossible to convict in a case where there was a transfer—taking it to absurdity—of a ton of hashish by one professional criminal to another individual. That is the conclusion that can be drawn from the cases I have cited.

That, I respectfully suggest, is absolutely unthinkable. As long as the transaction was a direct one between the person in possession of the substance and the person to whom it was given, assuming the word "give" were deleted, the court would have to find, based on the two judgments I have cited, that there was no distribution involved, and the accused would go free. I cannot contemplate such a proposition in law, or such a proposition coming from this honourable house.

I have not developed the other areas, such as the circumstances in which the accused can prove the substance was for his own use, the power in the court to hand down the minimum penalty, or the power which rests with the court, in the case of an individual who is charged with possession for the purpose of trafficking, to find him guilty of mere possession.

We are trying to protect the young person who may just give a cigarette, or a joint, to another person, as opposed to the professional drug trafficker or drug peddler. To delete the word "give" would not provide any more protection to our young people than is already available, but would provide a material defence, in a great many cases, for the real professional drug traffickers. For those individuals, it would be a bonanza. Indeed, the Crown's ability to prosecute traffickers would be almost nullified.

I would therefore urge that the motion in amendment be defeated.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am wondering whether the chairman of the committee has anything to say at this time. If so, I am willing to yield to him.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I am flattered that Senator Flynn thinks the debate on this amendment cannot be concluded without some remarks by me. At least, I am trying to put that thought in his mind.

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Senator Denis: He is learning.

Senator Goldenberg: I regret not having been here on Tuesday and Wednesday. I was not on vacation. I was on some official duties, having been asked to attend a function out of town on behalf of the government.

I presented the reasoning of the committee when I submitted the report to the Senate on Tuesday of last week, and shall say only a few words about the amendment moved by Senator Asselin on Tuesday. The honourable senator showed me the courtesy of discussing it with me before he moved it, and I appreciate his kind remarks about myself in commencing his speech. The amendment is something we discussed in committee. Unfortunately, Senator Asselin was absent from the session at which we discussed it.

Senator Asselin: If I was absent from that meeting, I was present when we concluded discussing the report itself, and the honourable senator will remember that I raised the question at that time.

Senator Goldenberg: I entirely agree. I was referring to the session at which we discussed this point in particular. Senator Asselin did raise the matter at the final meeting of the committee before adoption of the report. I referred to the previous session, not by way of any criticism of Senator Asselin but to explain my position, because during the committee hearings I held the same view as the honourable senator.

I was one of those who were very much concerned by the thought of a youngster at what is called a "pot party" handing a "joint" to a friend, and being caught and charged with trafficking. I was very much concerned then, but I am less concerned now because of the evidence submitted to the committee. I was satisfied by the evidence that if the word "give" were eliminated from the definition of "trafficking" it would open the door to "pushers," who would try to induce marihuana smoking by giving cigarettes to youngsters, that is, handing them out from time to time. This is what merchants do to promote their wares. This was one reason, and the main reason, why I decided that perhaps I was wrong in wanting the word "give" eliminated.

I was also influenced by the evidence of witnesses who testified that it was most unlikely that a youngster in the situation I have outlined would be prosecuted for trafficking; that he would be charged with possession and not with trafficking.

Finally, while I have not appeared in court for a long time, I have been a lawyer for many years. I have confidence in the ability of a judge to distinguish between the case of a youngster handing a cigarette to another at a college party, and a professional handing cigarettes out to students in the hope of encouraging them to smoke marihuana and in due course provide him with a great deal of profit. I was also led to believe that the experience of the prosecutors who appeared as witnesses before the committee justifies the conclusion that I have reached.

Honourable senators, for these reasons I admit that I myself have changed my mind and cannot support the amendment which Senator Asselin proposed very eloquently in a scholarly speech, which I read first thing this morning and on which I congratulate him.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators—

Senator Greene: From the sublime—

Senator Flynn: I am glad to hear my good friend, Senator Greene. He always helps me when I rise.

Senator Goldenberg: He always pays attention to you.

Senator Flynn: He provokes me into being more convincing, possibly—at least, more convincing than I would otherwise be.

The amendment moved by Senator Asselin is very limited in its wording. It would remove the word "give" from the definition of trafficking in this bill. However, there is more to it than the deletion of a single verb.

The amendment is based on the recommendation of the Le Dain Commission, to be found at page 302 of the English version of the report:

6(e) Trafficking should not include the giving, without exchange of value—

And I underline "without exchange of value."

—by one user to another of a quantity of cannabis which could reasonably be consumed on a single occasion.

That is the basis for the amendment moved by Senator Asselin.

Senator Choquette: Not a ton.

Senator Flynn: I will come to the argument raised by Senator McIlraith a little later.

I come now to the effect of deleting the word "give" from the definition of trafficking as it is found in this bill. I have heard Senator Manning and Senator McDonald, and maybe others, saying, "if someone gives a joint of marijuana to another and says, 'Pay me tomorrow,' well, that is not a gift."

It may be a problem of refuting the evidence but, as Senator Goldenberg mentioned, I also have confidence in our judges. Anyone telling an unbelievable story would not be believed by the judge. The defence has to rest on something which is credible, which can be accepted by the judge. It is true that somebody can lie, somebody can invent a defence, somebody can mount an alibi which rests on nothing, and be acquitted. That is true, but it is also true with regard to various other offences under the Criminal Code. I do not agree that because some may attempt to deceive the court we should recommend very restrictive terms in a definition in order that they not succeed. This may serve to make it very difficult, if not impossible, for others to get out of a trafficking charge which should not really have been made to apply to them. Senator Goldenberg says it would not be used. Well, it could be used, and this is the point—it could be used very easily.

Senator McDonald and others also do not accept the argument—which I suggested by interruptions, and I am sorry that I made those interruptions if they displeased the speakers at the time. But, for myself, I do not mind being interrupted, and I believe I may do to others what I would have them do to me.

Senator McDonald: On that point, you just referred to a statement that one could give and say, "Pay me later." If you can show me anywhere in the Hansard of this house where I made any reference to payment, I will eat your hat.

Senator Flynn: I heard you yesterday. I did not read your speech today. But I would say to Senator McDonald that these words were precisely those used by Senator Manning, in any event. I can understand that Senator McDonald wants to dissociate himself from Senator Manning. I take his word on the point he has raised.

Senator McDonald: I am not responsible for what Senator Manning says, but I am responsible for what I say.

Senator Flynn: That may be so. I shall not take time to read your speech at this time. I accept your word that you did not say it. But I do have a note here that you said, "give for the purpose of advertising." Am I correct in this?

Senator McDonald: I beg your pardon?

Senator Flynn: You used the words "give for advertising purposes."

Senator McDonald: That is correct.

Senator Flynn: That will be covered in my argument, which is to the effect that if you distribute to a lot of people—plural, as was mentioned by Senator McIlraith before—you come under the word "distribute." This is the point. "Give," on one occasion—this should never be the basis of a conviction for trafficking. If you have evidence of more than one, of several instances, then you have the word "distribute" in the definition, which would normally be sufficient to obtain a conviction in those cases.

Senator McDonald: May I ask one question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator McDonald: If you distribute, then the intention is that the person you distribute to will pay for it; is that not right? If you distribute any product, you expect those people to whom you distribute it to pay you.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator McDonald: But if I "give" a product, I do not expect anyone to pay. Is not that the difference?

Senator Flynn: In the definition, the word "distribute" is not connected to any payment. If you sell, of course, whether you are being paid right away or the next day it is the same. But if you distribute, as is mentioned in the definition, you do not expect any payment, immediate or later. You may expect that you will get some clients eventually. But you do not have to prove against the man who distributes that he is going to receive any payment for it, then and there or later. Distributing is isolated, I would say, from any compensation or payment of any kind. If you distribute, you are going to be convicted. This is the point.

In regard to the cases that have been mentioned, practically all except that blockbuster of a case mentioned by Senator McIlraith, had to do with distribution. I say that if you have evidence of distribution—that is, of giving—to several people, then you have evidence sufficient to obtain a conviction of trafficking, and you do not need the word "give" for that purpose.

Now Senator McIlraith has brought forth his massive argument of giving a ton of hashish for nothing. Of course, that is a problem which the judges can assess. I do not believe anyone could convince a judge that he has "given" a ton of hashish. That would be worth a considerable sum on the black market, and could in no way be considered a small gift. A gift of one ton of hashish is an incredible proposition. So surely you are not really trying to convince me, Senator McIlraith, that there is anything serious in that aspect of your argument.

● (1450)

Senator McIlraith: May I answer that question right now? If the honourable senator will read the judgment in the New Brunswick case which I referred to—and I have a copy of it here which I can lend him—he will see that that is the very point dealt with. If the ton of hashish was given to the one man, the one person, there could be no conviction when using only the word "distribute." It is not a distribution, and the case is squarely on the point.

Senator Flynn: I am afraid I would not have the same confidence in this judgment that Senator McIlraith seems to have. I am quite convinced that it would be quashed, because it is nonsense. After all, you have to assume that judges are capable of a bit of commonsense, and you have to assume the same with respect to the Senate also, Senator McIlraith.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator McIlraith: Would the honourable senator not admit that the judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal is the law and is binding?

Senator Flynn: No. If the Supreme Court of Canada confirmed such a judgment, I would. But I am quite certain that what you are giving as the judgment was not the judgment but was merely a comment, an aside, in the judgment.

Senator McIlraith: No, that is not the case. That was the judgment in Regina vs. Christiansen in the New Brunswick Court of Appeal.

Senator Flynn: Surely the question before the court did not concern a gift of one ton of hashish. That expression was a mere comment by the judge, and it is as silly from the judge as it would be from anyone else, and it could not possibly be the basis for the judgment. For God's sake, who are you trying to kid?

Senator McIlraith: The meaning of the word "distribute" is the basis of the judgment. I have the judgment here.

Senator Flynn: The case did not involve the giving of a gift of one ton of hashish, did it?

Senator McIlraith: It involved the gift of one cube of hashish to one person.

Senator Flynn: So it was not a ton.

Senator McIlraith: The whole point is that there could not be a conviction because that was not a distribution. The word "give" was not used in the charge laid, and the word "give" had to be used, otherwise there could not be a conviction. That is the very point.

Senator Flynn: The judge was not deciding that even if the accused had given one ton of hashish he could not be convicted.

Senator McIlraith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: No. And that is not the point because the fact is that a mere cube is not a ton, and you cannot possibly extend that judgment, or the meaning of that judgment, in the way which you suggest in order to bolster your argument. The judge cannot do that, and neither can you. You must think we are a bunch of credulous children if you think that we would believe for one moment that the meaning of this judgment could be extended to apply to a case in which the accused, having given one ton of hashish, would, because he had "given" it, be acquitted. That is ridiculous. I challenge anyone here with any experience before the criminal courts to sustain that argument. If a judge made those remarks, they were by way of obiter dictum.

Honourable senators, removing the word "give" does not create any real problem, except in the case where the only evidence you have against the trafficker is one instance of his giving marihuana to a friend. But if he had really been trafficking you would have evidence of a plural operation, just as described by Senator McIlraith.

Indeed, what I did find laudable in the remarks of Senator McIlraith was the fact that he was really proving my point that, if you have the evidence of a plural operation, you do not need the word "give". The word "distribute" is sufficient.

Senator Denis: It might be hard to prove, though.

Senator Flynn: If it is your intention to prove trafficking against a person with but the slim evidence of one small gift, do you not think that would be unfair—even to this man? I mean to say, if you do not have evidence, you do not have evidence and that is all there is to it. It has always been a principle in our law that it would be better to let a guilty person go free than to convict an innocent person.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question? If I understand him correctly, he is saying that a professional trafficker who seduces one young person by giving him hashish should go free unless it can be proved that he seduced more than one. Is that correct?

Senator Flynn: Possibly, yes. My friend seems to think he has a strong argument there. But the point is, how would anyone be able to make a judgment based on that mere fact of one act of giving unless it was possible to establish otherwise that that person was a trafficker? If you do establish otherwise that he is a trafficker, then you cannot say by the mere evidence of one gift of one joint that he is a trafficker. That is what you are trying to make us assent to here. You are trying to suggest that even though the evidence does not show any trafficking by a particular person, because you know from other evidence you have that he is a trafficker, that should be sufficient to convict him. Well, that is really against all principles of criminal law. It is against all principles of simple justice. I cannot agree to that. It is not because someone is otherwise a bad character that you should be able to convict him of a crime he has not committed. Surely, Senator Greene, you are not suggesting to the Senate that you would want to convict someone because of the mere fact he had given someone else a joint? That would be going exactly against the argument put forward by Senator Laird and Senator Goldenberg, that no prosecution would be taken on the basis of the evidence of the gift of one joint. Are you now saying exactly the contrary? Remember that the rule has to be applicable to all. The principle must be that a person is innocent until he is proven guilty, and that principle must apply as much in the case you have mentioned as in any other case. We must be fair not only in the application of the law but in the drafting of the law. To me that is the main thing.

The basis for Senator Asselin's amendment is to be found in the facts collected by the Le Dain Commission, together with their specific recommendation. That is one point. The second point is that the problems you have with regard to removing the word "give" are resolved by the word "distribute" in practically all cases. Certainly, the problem of giving a large quantity cannot be accepted by the court as a defence.

Finally, let me deal with those who oppose the argument because they are against the bill. Senator Heath said yesterday that she is against the bill, so I understand her argument on the amendment. If one is against the bill, one is against the amendment. After all, what is this bill meant to accomplish? It is meant to remove marihuana from the Narcotic Control Act. The government is asking Parliament to lessen the severity or the importance of the offence of using marihuana, and it is saying, "Take it away from the Narcotic Control Act, and put it under the Food and Drugs Act." Since the definition in the Narcotic Control Act includes the word "give", and since under the Food and Drugs Act the definition does not mention the word "give" but provides for distribution, then if you are really sincere in approving the bill you have to approve the amendment. If you are against the bill, as Senator Heath is, then you must vote against this amendment as you will against the bill. If you do not like the lessening of the offence, vote against the amendment, but later on vote against the bill. If you transfer the offence from one act to the other while maintaining its severity with regard to the minimum evidence that should be adduced, you will not be acting logically. You will be indulging in mere window-dressing.

● (1500)

I am very much afraid, personally, that the whole bill is simply window-dressing. But if it is not window-dressing, if you believe that it is too severe to keep marihuana under the Narcotic Control Act and you want to transfer it to the Food and Drugs Act, then, by Jove, be logical; accept the definition in the Food and Drugs Act, and remove the word "give" from the definition of trafficking to be found in this bill. However, if you are more concerned about the accused and his basic rights than you are about making it easier for the police to obtain convictions in marihuana cases, or making it easier for certain people to use the word "give" for purposes of blackmail, or making it easier for a judge who has no more judgment than to say that he would not be able to convict someone who gave a ton of hashish because it was alleged to have been a gift, you will have to accept Senator Asselin's amendment. And I suggest to you, honourable senators, that you should either vote for the amendment and then support the bill afterwards, or vote against the amendment but later on be logical and vote against the whole bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it has been interesting to listen to the arguments advanced from various parts of the chamber. I would now like to include a few brief thoughts of my own on the question before us.

I would remind honourable senators that according to testimony given to the committee which considered this proposed legislation, the removal of the word "give" from the definition of trafficking would have the effect of hamstringing the efforts of police forces across the country. This is the testimony that was presented to that committee by those witnesses who spoke to the point.

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking for the government now?

Senator Perrault: If we say that possession of cannabis is an offence and that it is similarly an offence to traffic in this drug, surely the police must be given adequate means to enforce the wishes of Parliament.

All of us in this chamber have a great deal of respect for the RCMP, and we are not unmindful of the terrible problem which they face, especially in cities like Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto, as well as other centres. They felt that "giving" the drug constitutes an integral part of trafficking. This is the view of the police forces charged with the grave responsibility of fighting the problem of drug usage in our society.

Senator Choquette: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Senator Perrault: May I complete my statement first? I do not resist questions, but I do want to get my views before you. Then I would be pleased to answer the question.

Senator Flynn: Is it a personal viewpoint, or the viewpoint of the government?

Senator Perrault: It is rather interesting for me to hear the Leader of the Opposition taking a position in this chamber this afternoon which can only be construed by many Canadians from coast to coast as a softening of the attitude toward the use of drugs in this country. I think there is a responsibility that devolves upon the Leader of the Opposition to give leadership in this country at the present time, because presently he is speaking for a great national party, a party which has expressed concern over this drug problem.

Please deal with the question at issue.

Senator Flynn: I am asking if you are expressing your own personal view, or if you are speaking for the government. At least you should have the courage to say yes or no.

Senator Perrault: I am making a statement of my views on this particular question—views which, perhaps, may be reflected by a majority in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: What about the government?

Senator McDonald: They will look after it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I rather think that when certain senators opposite believe they may be in some trouble, they engage in a series of interruptions. We listened carefully to what they had to say on this subject—and they advanced some very thoughtful ideas—and I think they should not be unduly sensitive about opinions expressed from other parts of this chamber.

As I said, the RCMP feel that the giving of the drug constitutes an integral part of the offence of trafficking. To have to depend on actually seeing the transfer of money as proof of trafficking would give rise to a situation where those engaged in a transaction of this kind could simply put money in a safety deposit vault, or a bank, or make payment in some other form. I think some members are being very naive about the ingenuity of those organized commercial dealers in drugs who have moved into the cannabis trade in a big way and have made it a multi-million dollar business in many parts of Canada. Let us not give them any breaks. Let us not give them any other advantages, because they enjoy enough now to enable them to move about all too freely.

Senator Flynn: Then withdraw the bill.

Senator Choquette: Are you ready to accept my question on that very point? I will be very brief.

Your argument, as I follow it—and you are trying to convince us—is that if the police ask us to do this, we should bow to them and grant their request. Do you remember the wire-tapping bill?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: That is not a question; it is an observation. If the honourable senator wishes to engage in the debate he will have an opportunity to do so.

Senator Choquette: Do you remember the wire-tapping bill?

Senator Perrault: I think the attitude of the Opposition appears to be: Do not confuse us with the facts; our minds are made up.

Senator Flynn: Well, we know that about you.

Senator Perrault: The attitude is: never let the facts stand in the way of a good argument.

We heard the Opposition earlier this afternoon, when the thoughtful comments of Senator McIlraith were presented to this chamber. The allegation was that the case of Regina vs. Christiansen is totally irrelevant to the matter before us. The fact is that certain aspects of the case met quite adequately some of the arguments we have heard from the Opposition today.

The headnote of this case, as one honourable senator pointed out, begins with the words:

Indictment—Accused charged with trafficking in narcotic by distributing—Evidence disclosing giving as means—Whether trial Judge should amend on own motion—Responsibility for correctness of indictment that of Crown counsel—

And so on. It might be useful for some members of this chamber to read this judgment.

Senator Flynn: As long as you can understand it.

Senator Perrault: One of the presiding jurists stated as follows:

The dictionary definition of "distribution" is an apportioning among many. In this case, the hashish was given to W. for his own use—none of the others present was to receive a share. Therefore there was no distribution as alleged and the acquittal must stand.

Senator Flynn: That is what I said.

Senator Perrault: "The acquittal must stand." But the judgment points out that a quantity of narcotics, or hashish, was given to the accused, and he proceeded to make a quantity of marihuana cigarettes out of the marihuana which he had received. Are we to assume that this is not to be an offence under the law?

Senator Flynn: An offence of possession.

Senator Perrault: Should it not have been an offence for a substantial quantity of marihuana to have been given to a member of an army barracks in the Maritimes? That is the nature of this case.

Senator Flynn: What is the quantity? We do not know.

Senator Perrault: Whatever the quantity was, it made a number of cigarettes.

Senator Flynn: A number, yes.

Senator Perrault: It was great generosity on the part of the distributor of marihuana to have given this chap, who was associated with many other soldiers in this particular military situation, a number of cigarettes "for his own use." Nevertheless, because it was alleged it was given only for his own use—only given to him—the charge was dismissed.

Senator Flynn: But the purpose of the bill is to provide for simple possession to be deemed to be not a very serious offence, as it used to be. The Honourable Leader of the Government should understand the purpose of the bill.

● (1510)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I wish that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition would learn to wiggle sitting down.

Senator Flynn: Well, you do all your wiggling standing up.

Senator Perrault: To have to depend upon actually seeing the transfer of money as proof of trafficking would give rise to the situation where those engaged in a transaction could simply deposit payments in a bank account or safety-deposit box, or something of the kind. What about a young person who simply passes a "joint" to a friend? Such a situation has been referred to by some honourable senators. This question was considered closely during the committee hearings, as a glance at the transcript of the committee proceedings will indicate. I think it may be useful to quote from the testimony of Mr. Landry, the Montreal Regional Director of the Department of Justice, to the Senate committee on April 29, 1975. This is what he said:

Mr. Halprin has seven years' experience in Vancouver and I have ten years' experience. I have been in Montreal since 1965 and have lived through all these cases personally for quite a period of time, and I have yet to see a case where someone has been charged with trafficking because he gave a cigarette or drug to a person.

I suggest, honourable senators, that Mr. Landry and Mr. Halprin have had a considerably greater amount of experience in cases of this kind than most members of this chamber. These were experts invited to testify before the committee. Then he went on to say this:

It is very easy to say, academically speaking, that would be the crime of trafficking, but how do you prove it? I have still to run across a case where I have the evidence of such an event happening. It may have occurred rarely in Canada, where an undercover agent was given a drug and the person giving it was charged with trafficking, but it is a very unusual situation for the very reason that you cannot prove that. On the other hand, it may facilitate prosecution in certain circumstances, where people could easily defend themselves by saying, "I did not intend to sell it. I had five pounds but I only intended to give it to friends from time to time."

This is exactly the basis of the case cited by Senator McIlraith—the case from New Brunswick. That is exactly how the accused in the case in New Brunswick was acquitted. Mr. Landry continued:

By having the word "give" in the definition of trafficking, that would not be an excuse on a possession for the purpose of trafficking charge. I have yet in my jurisdiction to see a case for a straight offence of trafficking by somebody giving the drug to another person, because you never get that. I have never heard of such a case happening.

So the point that is being made, and has been made by other speakers with great expertise in the law, is that while it may do some damage to remove it, it does absolutely no harm whatever to leave it in, and we do not want to give encouragement to those who are making substantial incomes by trafficking in human misery, such as is taking place from coast to coast in Canada by those engaged in a great commercial exploitation of human weakness. This is precisely what we are doing.

Senator Flynn: How can you reconcile this testimony, where they say that not a single case has been based on a single operation, with the idea that it would be helpful since the word is there?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me repeat again what has been said here earlier.

Senator Flynn: No, don't repeat it; explain it.

Senator Perrault: In those cases where a technical defence can be entered—

Senator Flynn: It has not happened.

Senator Perrault: —the people charged with law enforcement in this country say that this kind of defence could be entered conceivably—

Senator Flynn: Could!

Senator Perrault: Yes, "could." You are talking in terms of protecting a young person who is an innocent dupe. There has yet to be a case in Canada where a person of that kind has faced a major penalty for what is regarded as a minor offence. But the law-enforcement officials say that we must not allow any escape hatches for those who are using the presence of that word "give" for the exploitation of many people, and are really engaged in the process of trafficking.

Honourable senators, we are told that in cases such as the one I have mentioned involving the giving of a few "joints," the persons involved are never, or virtually never, charged with trafficking but are charged instead with simple possession.

There is one very important point which perhaps has not been made clear enough in this debate, and that is that the court has the final say, for under Bill S-19 the court will now have the option of using the discretion provided it under section 662.1 of the Criminal Code to give an absolute or conditional discharge. Honourable senators should be reminded—particularly those who are worried that certain prosecutors will interpret the definition of trafficking very strictly and lay a charge of trafficking for the transfer of one "joint," if I might use an extreme example; I know that this is of concern to some senators—that in these cases the judge can give an absolute or conditional discharge. There is this balance in the discretionary power of the court to grant a discharge as it sees fit.

Honourable senators, I think we should keep the word "give" in the definition of trafficking to enable our police forces to enforce the wishes of this Parliament with respect to the control of cannabis. We should not impede the efforts of our police forces to try to convict the professional trafficker, and we should do nothing here which might provide any kind of moral encouragement for those who are reaping a vast dividend from the exploitation of human tragedy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: May I ask a question? My honourable friend referred to the testimony of some experts. Does he not agree that those experts were opposed entirely to the bill? In fact, if the honourable senator says that we should not do anything to encourage these people, then the only logical attitude would be to vote against the bill. Does he realize that?

Senator Perrault: These witnesses were not opposed to the bill. But it seems to me, honourable senators, to be rather persuasive evidence indeed when the hard-pressed police forces of this country, together with those people who deal with the charges every day in the courts, are of the view that it would weaken their efforts if that word were removed from this legislation.

Senator Choquette: But that is what they told us in connection with wire-tapping, and you discarded it. Do you remember that? The police begged us to leave section 90 in that measure.

Senator Flynn: To vote against the bill was to vote against the police.

Some Hon. Senators: Let us have the vote. Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by Honourable Senator Côtteau, that this report be now adopted.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Choquette, that the report be not now adopted but that it be amended by adding thereto the following amendment:

9. Page 4, line 22: Strike out the word "give".

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are in favour of Senator Asselin's motion in amendment will please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are against Senator Asselin's motion in amendment will please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Shall the main motion for the adoption of the report carry?

Senator Flynn: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. A. E. Haddon Heath: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I wonder if I may speak to the main motion? As a senator from Western Canada I would feel very much remiss in my duty if I did not make some contribution this afternoon.

When we were asked to give approval in principle to Bill S-19 I was one of the reluctant ones. I felt that the principle involved was that of reducing the penalties that obtain with respect to cannabis offences. However, the view prevailed at that time that we were simply changing the law regarding cannabis, and that the law dealing with cannabis did need some change. So I accepted that view, and reluctantly went along with the idea of pursuing the matter, and of giving the bill approval in principle.

● (1530)

The good thing which came out of that was that the bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, under the able chairmanship of Senator Goldenberg. The committee heard scientific and legal evidence, as well as evidence of new developments that hitherto we had not been aware of. It was a hard-working committee, conscientious and diligent. I therefore regret that I cannot concur with many of the committee's recommendations.

There is perhaps a sense of being overwhelmed by the amount of material that we considered, the amount of evidence brought forward. I must confess a sense of being underwhelmed by the provisions of the bill being proposed at this time.

We are in a crisis situation with regard to the whole drug scene in Canada. One need not come from Western Canada to know that it is an epidemic situation.

What does Bill S-19 do in a forward, productive and practical way? I have the feeling that Bill S-19 is engraving in stone the actual judgments being brought down today by our courts under the Narcotic Control Act. I suppose it shows a great vote of confidence in our judicial system, to the extent that what our judges deliver as verdicts are considered to be something that should be written into statute law. In my opinion, that is not the right approach at this time, and will do nothing to ameliorate the crisis situation now facing us.

Prior to taking part in the debate, I asked myself the question: Does Bill S-19 make it more, or less, likely that young children will be given access to a dangerous drug; does it make it more, or less, likely that those who supply or profit from a dangerous drug will continue their ugly trade; does it make it more, or less, likely that youngsters will be introduced to a variety of drugs; does it make it more, or less, likely that the police can apprehend the hardened criminal, that the courts can convict him, and that the court's ruling will be sustained? I have to say that Bill S-19 does not go very far in redirecting, putting a thrust to, the attack on the current drug problem. The aims of such a bill should be to make it unattractive to anyone who wants to experiment with cannabis or to persuade other people to use it. It should be utterly ruinous to cultivate, traffic, export or import cannabis.

It is 10 years since the drug problem really assumed proportions that caused people to become concerned, and by a tremendous effort of coordination and cooperation with various police forces throughout the country we are gradually gaining control over it. The operative word is "control." We are not stamping it out. Possibly we must now consider the problem as we do an infectious disease, such as cholera. In the case of cholera, we would first control it, we hope, and then hopefully eradicate it. As legislators, what are we doing with Bill S-19? Are we doing everything we can, first, to control, and then eradicate? In fact, are we doing anything at all with Bill S-19?

I will not go into the proposals—honourable senators have had them clearly explained—dealing with possession, and how they differ from present practices only in degree and not in method or philosophy. After attending many of the committee hearings, and knowing the concern of senators is very much with the younger element of the population, I ask: Are we, in fact, giving them sufficient protection? We already have done that by Part II of the Narcotic Control Act, which has never been proclaimed. There is all the structure necessary, ready to be put into operation, so that there could be some compulsory education, medical treatment, or whatever is necessary to look after first offenders.

What good does it do to impose a fine of $500, or, if they cannot pay, to jail them for three months? It has been clearly established that jail will do nothing for them, and a fine of $500 will probably lead them to do who knows what in order to get the money.

● (1540)

Part II of the Narcotic Control Act provides for preventive detention for a person convicted of trafficking, possession for the purpose of trafficking, and importing or exporting, where that person has been previously convicted of these offences. The sentence is to be served in a penitentiary for an indefinite period in lieu of any other sentence that could be imposed. That provision, by the way, was passed in 1961 and was heralded as a major new policy in Canadian drug legislation. It is to be found in section 15 of the Narcotic Control Act.

Under section 16, a person charged with possession may be remanded for observation for seven days. Possession for the purpose of trafficking, importing and exporting are also included in this section. If the individual is convicted, then under section 17 he or she may be sentenced to custody for treatment for an indeterminate period if, on the basis of the evidence adduced, he or she is found to be a narcotic addict.

Section 2 of the act defines a narcotic addict as follows:

"narcotic addict" means a person who through the use of narcotics,

(a) has developed a desire or need to continue to take a narcotic, or

(b) has developed a psychological or physical dependence upon the effect of a narcotic.

The provision for compulsory treatment has never been proclaimed. I have been unable to discover why. It seems to me that with the framework already available it would not be too difficult to do something constructive to stem the increase in drug addiction, and the crimes that are perpetrated as a result of drug addiction.

After reviewing all of the evidence I could not help but get the feeling that it was as if somebody had said, "Look, we have to do something about the Le Dain Commission recommendations. Come on, you chaps, whip up some legislation."

It does not seem to me, having heard the evidence and having looked at what is already in place, and seeing how very similar those recommendations are to what is already in the Narcotic Control Act, that we are not going to go far enough with what a distinguished legal counsel referred to the other day as "tiddlywink" legislation. In my opinion, events have overtaken the report of the Le Dain Commission. Much in the way of new evidence has come forward since 1974. I think that if the Le Dain Commission were still sitting, its recommendations might take a different direction.

One of the most difficult problems that we face is the lack of publicity given to the dangers inherent in cannabis. It was evident in the testimony before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee that information concerning the dangers of cannabis is simply not reaching the public.

One study conducted by Hardin B. Jones, Assistant Director, Donner Laboratory, University of California, Berkeley, showed that THC, the active component in cannabis, is stored in the fatty tissue to an extent comparable to DDT. In other words, even a year after you stop using cannabis, the THC component is still in the fatty tissue of the brain, and so forth. I am not saying that those who use cannabis are fatheads. However, this information has come to light since 1974.

We also had testimony from Professor Morton A. Stenchever, Chairman of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology, University of Utah Medical School, that the use of cannabis leads to chromosome damage.

Canada has always been in the forefront, particularly with regard to food and drug regulations. We have always taken the position that the substance must be proven safe before it can be distributed in Canada. Other countries often put it the other way—that is, unless the product is proven harmful, they accept it for distribution. I prefer the Canadian way.

In the event that we do proceed with Bill S-19—and I do not feel we would be doing the government a service by proceeding with it—there are one or two things I should like to mention on the practical side. Whether we adopt the proposed legislation or not, some of these suggestions may be pertinent to the Narcotic Control Act.

First of all, we want very much to avoid a young offender's ending up with a criminal record. If the individual's age is 18 years or under, in most instances he or she would not have a criminal record because previous trials would have been in the juvenile courts. However, if the individual is beyond the age where he or she is considered a juvenile, Bill S-19 really does not accomplish all that much in the way of avoiding a criminal record. Under the proposed section 52 of the Food and Drugs Act, the Identification of Criminals Act will still apply, and it has to apply if we are going to have subsequent offenders. There has to be some means of identifying subsequent offenders.

The subsequent offender section precludes a subsequent conviction in the case of an individual convicted of an offence in relation to one of the restricted or controlled drugs. In other words, if an individual has been convicted with respect to LSD, he would not go under the category of a subsequent offender for the purposes of Bill S-19. I think that is a serious oversight.

I also feel that the provisions with respect to the prosecution of the offence of possession for the purpose of trafficking under the new section 53 should be reviewed, as that procedure, from a practical point of view, is cumbersome, inconvenient, and out of keeping with the general method of proof in a criminal proceeding.

These are not my own words. I asked a distinguished counsel in British Columbia, who has also been a member of Parliament for many years, and a public-spirited man, to help me on this. He also suggested that the definition of "possession" be enlarged to create certain presumptions in favour of the Crown when drugs are found in a dwelling house normally occupied by the accused, in his clothing or belongings, or in any motor vehicle owned and being operated by him at the time that the drugs were found. There are many countries in which the motor vehicle is the first thing confiscated if drugs are found in it. We do not seem to worry about that kind of thing at all.

A definition of "possession" is not contained in the bill, but there is one in section 3 of the Criminal Code. I have a copy here, and I would ask that it form part of my remarks at this point.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Heath: It is as follows:

(4) For the purposes of this Act,

(a) a person has anything in possession when he has it in his personal possession or knowingly

(i) has it in the actual possession or custody of another person, or

(ii) has it in any place, whether or not that place belongs to or is occupied by him, for the use or benefit of himself or of another person; and

(b) where one of two or more persons, with the knowledge and consent of the rest, has anything in his custody or possession, it shall be deemed to be in the custody and possession of each and all of them.

Another aspect to note is that many people involved with both prosecuting and defending these cases would like to see cannabis defined more specifically. I know the Leader of the Government is aware of the problems we are having in British Columbia right now with respect to cannabis sativa. L. There are some interesting cases developing on the West Coast with respect to that at this time. I think the legal community would like it to be more specifically defined.

Another problem, from a practical point of view, arises with regard to certificates. The certificates mentioned in section 55 should be admissible without notice to the accused, subject to the right of the accused to cross-examine as contemplated by section 55(2).

● (1550)

There is a further matter. From the practical aspect, perhaps an adequate solution would be for the arresting officers, upon seizing the substance, to advise the accused that it would be analyzed and, if the analysis proved that the substance was an offending drug, evidence of same would be introduced by way of certificate pursuant to the statute, and that a copy of such certificate could be obtained prior to trial at his request. That would certainly speed these things up. I must say, from the aspect of legal activity, it is very difficult to serve these people, as they go under assumed names, and all kinds of delays take place, and that is holding up actions in the courts tremendously.

There is a great deal more to be said, obviously. There is one thing which I have left out and which I hope some of my colleagues will deal with. This is the adverse publicity we have received through the press. At a Victoria school board meeting, an account of which I read in the Victoria Columnist, the problem of cannabis in the schools was discussed. School boards are comprised of pretty responsible people, I think you will agree. Those people came up with the idea: "The Senate is about to legalize marihuana, so why should we be concerned about it; they must know what they are doing." This adverse publicity has been going all over the country ever since this bill was introduced. Until there is some good strong educational publicity about what we are trying to do, and preferably compulsory education for young offenders, and until Part II of the Narcotic Control Act is proclaimed, I cannot see that we are making very much headway.

Honourable senators, I would like to end on a more positive note. We are all now aware of the problem, of the dimensions of the problem, and of the choice that we have, and I feel confident that we will exercise whatever powers we have as responsibly as possible.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, in giving the schedule of work for next week, I omitted to say that the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet on Thursday morning at 9.30. Also, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet on Tuesday at 2 p.m., and not at 9.30 a.m. as I said earlier.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 10, at 8 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Brewin, Joyal and Caccia had been substituted for those of Mr. Gilbert, Miss Bégin and Mr. Landers, that the name of Mr. Kaplan had been substituted for that of Mr. Caccia, and that the name of Miss Bégin had been substituted for that of Mr. Joyal on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL

CONCURRENCE BY COMMONS IN SENATE ADMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, without amendment.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Final Report of the Tax Measures Review Committee, dated June 1975, entitled: "Corporate Tax Measures Review," presented by the Minister of Finance.

Copies of correspondence between officials of the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba relating to the Nelson River Transmission System.

Report of operations under the Crop Insurance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 13 of the said Act, Chapter C-36, R.S.C., 1970.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Senator Perrault presented Bill S-27, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, June 12.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCASTING

APPEARANCE OF GERDA MUNSINGER ON CBC TELEVISION PROGRAM—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Forsey: I thank honourable senators very much. It is a great pleasure for me to be back after a sojourn in a much less agreeable milieu.

I wish to give notice that on Thursday next, June 12, 1975, I shall inquire of the government as follows:

1. How much did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pay Mrs. Gerda Munsinger for her appearance on the Barbara Frum program on CBC TV at 9 o'clock Saturday evening, June 7, 1975,

(a) by way of expenses,

(b) by way of fees?

2. Has Mrs. Munsinger a record of criminal convictions in Canada?

3. How long is she to be allowed to remain in Canada?

I had intended to ask under what provisions of the Immigration Act she had been admitted, but I discovered on my return to the office yesterday that my friend and colleague Senator Molson had already anticipated me on that.

4. Is it the intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to present other persons of similar qualifications on this program at public expense?

5. If so, what is the budget for such appearances?

6. What criteria does the corporation use in selecting the people who are to appear on this program?

7. Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program is a proper use of public money?

8. Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program conforms with the CBC's mandate as laid down in the Broadcasting Act?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I note the return to the Senate of the Honourable Senator Forsey, restored to his buoyant good health. He obviously has lost nothing in the way of vigour as a result of his brief incarceration in hospital. I want to assure him that the government will assiduously set forth to provide replies to the questions posed in his Notice of Inquiry.

Senator Walker: Would Senator Forsey elaborate? What does he mean by "qualifications"?

Senator Flynn: What does he expect?

Senator Walker: I know she is writing a biography.

Senator Langlois: It is good publicity, anyway.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, June 11, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Asselin: Explain.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, may I offer an explanation for this motion? Tomorrow the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will deal first of all with Bill S-24, to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada, and judging by the witnesses who will attend, it may take some time to complete our consideration of that bill. Then, with the aid of our experts, we will resume our study of the subject matter of Bill C-60, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency. Then we will resume our study of the subject matter of Bill C-2, the competition legislation in the light of the more recent developments in that area. I expect that we may be engaged most of the day in dealing with these items of business.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Grosart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator MacDonald be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Welch on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

VICTORIA MEMORIAL MUSEUM

RUMOURED CHANGE OF NAME—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I have a very simple question for the Leader of the Government. Is it the intention of the government, as I have heard rumoured, to remove the word "Victoria" from the name of the museum at the foot of Metcalfe Street? I would add to my question my hope that if this is done it will not be changed to "Muscan"—as so many things are being changed in this fashion nowadays. But I should like to know if there is any truth in the rumour.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that particular rumour has not been brought to my attention. I would be interested to know the source of the honourable senator's information. However, be that as it may, I shall conduct the appropriate inquiries and attempt to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the rumour.

TRANSPORT

FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE—QUESTION

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, I have had several inquiries about freight assistance for feed in the Maritimes, and I have not been able to find any reference to nor have I been able to acquire any information about the introduction of a new bill concerning feed freight assistance. A question was asked in the House of Commons yesterday about a change in policy, and the response from Mr. Sharp was that there was none that he knew of.

When the new feed grains policy was announced on May 22, 1974, the federal government promised that feed freight assistance in the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec would not be changed unless a high degree of self-sufficiency in grain production was achieved there. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure the Senate that this is still government policy and that no changes whatsoever are being contemplated before self-sufficiency is achieved? In other words, as long as the Atlantic provinces must import feed grain, the freight subsidy will be paid.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope I may take that question as notice. It is rather detailed and I will obtain the reply as quickly as possible.

Senator Flynn: We hope you will.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

PARDON GRANTED TO DÉDÉ DESJARDINS—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could throw any light on the pardon granted to Dédé Desjardins, who has become very famous in my province as one of the key figures in the construction industry. He must have been convicted of some criminal offence, because he was apparently granted a pardon. This was after figuring prominently in the inquiry into the difficulties of our construction industry in Quebec. I gather that he has now been rehired as a consultant, although he is considered by many as being one of the most sinister figures on the Quebec scene.

I would ask specifically the charge of which he was convicted, how he was granted a pardon, on whose recommendation it was granted and when?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that an inquiry along similar lines has gone forward to the government from the honourable Premier of Quebec. To my knowledge, he has not yet received a reply. I shall undertake inquiries of my own, however, in an attempt to enlighten the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

● (2020)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Chief Government Whip, Senator Petten.

Senator Flynn: The Whip; no, you cannot.

Senator Argue: As I read the rules, one senator may ask another senator a question. Anyway, I intend to try.

As the Whip is well aware, he has been standing for some weeks now the order for the resumption of the debate on my motion for second reading of Bill S-23, to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment). Could he report to the chamber whether other senators are prepared to take part in this debate? I suggest to him that in light of the importance of this question, the Senate should be given an early opportunity to make a decision on it.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, when I stood the order for the resumption of the debate on Senator Argue's motion, certain senators had indicated their wish to speak to it. However, up to this point none has come forward. If no senator wishes to speak, I presume it would be in order for Senator Argue to close the debate.

CRIMINAL CODE

CHARGES OF ILLEGAL ABORTION—ACQUITTAL OF DR. HENRY MORGENTALER BY JURY—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, since Dr. Henry Morgentaler has been acquitted twice on a charge of illegal abortion by a jury in Montreal, I would like to know if the government is disposed already to bring about amendments to the Criminal Code regarding abortions?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no present inclination on the part of the government to change the laws and regulations with respect to abortions.

Senator Flynn: Is there any possibility that a jury decision might change the law of the country?

Senator Walker: No, that would be shocking.

Senator Langlois: If it were the wrong decision.

Senator Flynn: That is my question.

STANDING COMMITTEES

NOTICE OF MEETINGS—CORRECTION

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I would like to call attention to an error in the Notice of Committee Meetings appended to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, June 5. Notice was given of a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for the examination of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration for 3.30 p.m. tomorrow. This notice should have been for 9.30 a.m., as indicated in the notices sent to honourable senators.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT
NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 5, the debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I was perhaps a little strict in asking that the debate be limited to Senator Asselin's amendment. However, I did not wish the debate to be concluded last week because other senators, particularly Senator Manning, had indicated their desire to discuss other aspects of the report. I understand that Senator Phillips is now ready to proceed, and with the consent of the house I yield to him or to any other honourable senator who wishes to speak.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, after Bill S-19 was introduced I was amazed to hear a radio commentator say that the so-called marihuana bill was introduced in the Senate because the House of Commons considered the subject too hot to handle.

I do not think anyone can criticize the standing Senate committee that dealt with Bill S-19. It provided a fair hearing to the various viewpoints, and earned the various compliments it received. I am not in complete agreement with the report, but I do not wish my remarks to be taken as criticism of the work of the committee.

When the chairman presented his report in the Senate, various news media reported that the Senate had recommended an increase in the penalty for trafficking in marihuana. There may be a certain element of fact in this, if we compare what is in the bill with the amendment, but we must remember that the existing legislation provides life imprisonment for trafficking.

The proposed new section 49 of the Food and Drugs Act provides two types of conviction for trafficking—summary conviction and conviction upon indictment. The penalty for summary conviction is a fine of $1,000 or not more than 18 months in prison, or both. This is a very light penalty for trafficking in drugs, and the committee did not change this. Instead, it changed the penalty for conviction upon indictment, increasing it to a maximum term of imprisonment of 14 years less a day.

Honourable senators, I believe there will be a great deal of plea bargaining, that 90 per cent of the convictions will be under the provision for summary conviction, and it will be 40 or 50 years before the pendulum swings back the other way and we find anyone receiving the maximum penalty. Therefore, we should not attempt to fool anyone by saying we have increased the penalty for trafficking.

When the bill was introduced, the Solicitor General announced on television that the sentences of all those presently convicted of drug trafficking would be reviewed to determine whether they would be eligible for parole. I wonder why drug traffickers are entitled to receive such preferential treatment. We should ask ourselves what these people will do when they are released. I cannot imagine anyone hiring them or providing any form of employment for them. The only thing they can do is return to trafficking in drugs. In fact, the Solicitor General left me with the impression that he was willing to pay Rivard overtime for the time he spent in prison.

Senator Perrault's argument on Senator Asselin's amendment last Thursday was that we should assist the overworked and harassed police forces of this country, and that we should be very mindful of their request. I would remind the honourable Leader of the Government that one of the proposed amendments of the committee is to remove the minimum sentence in the new section 50 for importing or exporting drugs.

Senator Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator allow a correction?

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Goldenberg: The honourable senator is constantly talking about "drugs." This bill does not deal with drugs; it deals only with marihuana. It does not deal with any other drugs.

Senator Phillips: You are quite right in that respect. I should be saying "cannabis" rather than "drugs."

Senator Perrault was very persuasive in his argument last Thursday. I hope he will be just as persuasive this evening and remind honourable senators that the RCMP, and many other police forces, requested that the minimum penalty under section 50 be retained. In fact, he might remind honourable senators that the RCMP opposes Bill S-19.

I think everyone can share the sympathy of the committee for the young offender who makes a mistake, the young person who tries a marihuana cigarette—

Senator Asselin: A joint.

Senator Phillips: —and gets caught, and who then has a criminal record. I was rather surprised to learn that very few of those entitled to a pardon have requested one. Perhaps this is a reflection on our court and legal system. Perhaps it is not what we believe it to be.

If a first offender receives a discharge and, with that, a pardon, one is then moved to ask how he or she will be convicted of a subsequent offence? There would be no record. The Criminal Records Act provides that when a pardon is granted the record shall be sealed and kept by a commissioner, and only upon the consent of the Solicitor General can the record be unsealed.

Bill S-19 will certainly make the smoking of marihuana much more acceptable, and we can therefore expect an increase in the number of cases coming before the courts. Do we expect that a judge or a Crown prosecutor will apply to the Solicitor General for permission to search the records to determine whether or not there was a previous conviction?

I have heard some suggestion that fingerprinting, under the Identification of Criminals Act, may be used. Here again, I am left wondering whether we have sufficient personnel for this purpose. We should be able to identify those individuals who have appeared in court on a number of occasions so that they may not be in a position to claim repeatedly theirs is a first offence. I understand the committee spent some time on this question, and I would appreciate a further explanation from the chairman when he closes the debate.

● (2030)

Honourable senators, I have stated that I cannot support the report. I still believe the report allows Bill S-19 to become an illegitimate attempt to legitimize marihuana.

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I have only one more word to add. I am afraid to take a bad risk by heeding the advice found in the argument put forward by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that those who voted against the amendment last Thursday should vote against the bill. I am going to follow his advice, for I feel that the bill is more lenient than the present legislation.

I still believe in the good judgment of judges. I still believe in the good judgment of the Parole Board. I feel that it is their duty to decide whether the guilty should be sentenced to life imprisonment upon subsequent offences, and so on.

It is almost with regret that I follow the advice of the Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I make a few additional comments to the points I endeavoured to make during the debate on the amendment then before the house.

All of us properly wish to extend to the committee that spent so long in examining this bill our appreciation for the depth of the study they made, the variety of witnesses they heard, and the time they spent in arriving at a decision on what is a very controversial and difficult matter. I say that with all sincerity, notwithstanding the fact that I cannot agree with their conclusions.

In his report to the house, the chairman of the committee, Senator Goldenberg, pointed out that the important recommendations of the committee boiled down to three. These have all been discussed in the debate that has already taken place. The committee recommends that the maximum penalty for trafficking be imprisonment for 14 years less one day. The report states that this is an increase in the penalty proposed in the bill as introduced in this house. As I pointed out the other day, this is a rather misleading comparison, because the comparison should more properly be made with the law as it presently exists. As honourable senators are all aware, under the Narcotic Control Act the penalty for trafficking can be imprisonment for life, so the effect of this recommendation is to reduce the maximum penalty for trafficking from life to 14 years less one day.

I do not want to repeat what I have already said on this subject, other than to stress once more that in assessing this matter many Canadian people share the view that cannabis in itself is not the serious problem. If it were something that could be isolated from the total drug subculture, I do not think we would be discussing the points that have occupied our time in this debate. The great concern in this matter is that cannabis is an introductory drug—if you can call it a drug—that is used, perhaps more than any other substance, to introduce young people to the drug subculture.

Senator Asselin: What about alcohol?

Senator Manning: I do not want to get on to the subject of alcohol. I think you would have to admit that the damage resulting from alcohol is far more excessive than that caused by people smoking marihuana. That is not the question before us.

My point is that there is plenty of evidence that a large percentage of young people who do become addicted to hard drugs start with the smoking of marihuana cigarettes or using marihuana in some form. It is not that it is addictive and leads to other drugs by reason of being addictive; but it is an introduction to what has become recognized by everyone as the drug subculture. We all know the attitude of young people. They want to keep up to their peers and it may seem quite smart when they start out smoking a few marihuana cigarettes. But it is not long before someone says, "How long are you going to be content with that kid stuff; why don't you do something really sophisticated?" It is at that stage that many young people start experimenting with hard drugs, which leads to the devastating effects with which we are all familiar. It is for this reason, above all else, that I feel that for anybody found guilty of trafficking in a substance that introduces young people to the drug subculture, the penalty of life imprisonment is not too severe.

I know the answer quite often given, and it has been given in this house, is that it is only a theoretical penalty, because the courts will never impose a life sentence. I regret that that is all too true. But surely that should not detract from the people's representatives in Parliament expressing the public will in this matter. Surely that must be some guide to the courts as to how concerned parents feel about an action that can have such far-reaching serious results.

On the second amendment, I am not going to spend much time. It is the removal of the minimum penalty on conviction for the importing or exporting of cannabis. I have difficulty in finding any valid reason why the minimum penalty should be reduced. I do not think this is a major amendment, because the court has discretion to impose whatever penalty it thinks fit and the minimum probably has very little practical significance. I merely repeat that I see no valid reason for its removal.

The third recommendation is that in cases of absolute or conditional discharge a complete pardon should be automatic in order to remove the criminal record. We all understand and appreciate the thinking of the committee that is behind that recommendation. It is a very sad and a very undesirable thing to have a lot of young people saddled with a criminal record, especially a first offender. But while a great many people would agree that there should be a provision to get rid of a criminal record in cases of this kind, there are also many people who would question seriously whether the unconditional and automatic pardon is desirable or even beneficial for first time offenders. Certainly provision should be made for a pardon; certainly the process should be made as simple as possible, as uncomplicated as possible, and it should not subject the first time offender to harassment through extensive police investigation—which is one of the reasons given by the committee why not many first time offenders apply for a pardon. Nevertheless, I think it is reasonable that there be at least a minimum probationary period before a pardon is granted. That period should be at least six months, or even one year.

● (2040)

I believe there is merit in the person involved being required to make application for his pardon. If he is not sufficiently concerned with the fact that he has a criminal record attached to his name to apply for such a pardon, that in itself reveals something significant about his attitude to the whole question of respect for the law, and his sense of responsibility in acknowledging that he was wrong in violating the law in the first place. If his attitude to a criminal record is, "I couldn't care less," then a prospective employer of that person, and society as a whole, surely has a right to know that such is his attitude towards the law and towards respect for the law. The revelation of that attitude is probably more important than the fact that the criminal record is wiped out by an automatic pardon.

For that reason I would not want to see an automatic pardon granted, although, as I said earlier, I would like to see the process for obtaining a pardon simplified. It is reasonable and, in the last analysis, is in the interests of the first offender himself to require that he assume at least enough responsibility to apply for a pardon when provision has been made whereby he can obtain it, and thus remove a criminal record which is of concern to him.

On motion of Senator Prowse, debate adjourned.

OCEAN DUMPING CONTROL BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-37, to provide for the control of dumping of wastes and other substances in the ocean.

He said: Honourable senators, to bring this bill to the attention of the Senate is a privilege, because the bill represents a national response to the international concern of pollution in the world's oceans. This bill is also of great importance to Canada in the protection of her renewable resources. Canada has consistently been in the vanguard at international fora striving for the increased protection of the environment, a task which can only be successfully achieved through international cooperation.

Late in 1972 an agreement to control ocean dumping was reached in London by 91 nations including Canada. That agreement is now referred to as the London Convention. The basic principles underlying the London Convention are briefly as follows: First, that the sea and the life it supports are vitally important to all the world's people. This being so, all of the world's people have a direct interest in making sure that the sea is managed and used in ways that will damage neither its quality nor its resources.

Second, that the capacity of the sea to absorb punishment, to assimilate wastes without damage, and to sustain life, is not unlimited. The sea is vital yet fragile.

Third, that the nations signing the Convention also recognized, in keeping with the charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, that nations have the sovereign right to exploit their own resources, but that at the same time they have the responsibility to ensure that things done within the areas which lie within their jurisdiction do not damage the environment of other nations.

In addition, the participating nations agreed to take measures individually and collectively to prevent marine pollution caused by the uncontrolled dumping of wastes into the oceans.

Canada signed the London Convention in December 1972, thereby committing herself both to the principles of the Convention and to her intention to ratify. The passing of this legislation will permit Canada to join those nations which have already ratified the agreement, and will justify her position as a leader in the protection of the marine environment.

Before elaborating on Bill C-37, let me outline briefly the features of the London Convention. The Convention, when ratified, will prohibit the dumping of wastes in the oceans without specific permission granted by the national authority designated by the state concerned. Under the terms of the Convention, the "dumping of wastes" does not include waste disposal at sea resulting from the normal operation of vessels, aircraft, platforms or other installations; nor does it include the disposal at sea of wastes generated in the exploration, exploitation and offshore processing of seabed mineral resources. Separate instruments have been, and are being, developed to deal with those types of pollution problems.

"Dumping" means the deliberate disposal at sea of wastes, or other matter, from vessels, aircraft, platforms or other man-made structures including disposal of wastes at sea by incineration. It also covers the deliberate disposal at sea of vessels, aircraft, platforms or other man-made structures themselves. The treatment of the world's oceans as repositories for the garbage of mankind will no longer be tolerated, if this Convention is signed by the necessary number of states.

The London Convention was not the first international agreement on this subject; it was preceded in 1972 by a regional agreement known as the Oslo Convention, which was for the protection of northeast Atlantic fisheries and contiguous waters. The Oslo Convention was signed by 12 northwest European nations.

Bill C-37 will give the Government of Canada the legislative authority to control and manage dumping by all vessels in Canadian waters. That latter term includes Arctic waters within the meaning of the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act; it also includes Canada's fishing zones.

The bill will also apply to dumping by Canadian ships, wherever they are located, and it will apply to all ships loading wastes in Canadian ports with the intention of disposing of them at sea.

● (2050)

The control of dumping activity by Bill C-37 will be by means of a permit system. All types of dumping will be subject to permit, and a prescribed fee will be charged to applicants.

In both our proposed national legislation and the London Convention, the wastes being dealt with fall into two main classes. Schedule I includes all those wastes which are known to be capable of causing damage to the marine environment. These substances are prohibited, and no permits will be granted for their disposal at sea except in very special circumstances. Included in these substances are organohalogen compounds such as DDT, PCB's and others. Also listed are mercury and cadmium and their compounds, persistent plastics and synthetics, oil of all kinds, high level radioactive wastes, and materials produced for biological and chemical warfare. As a further example perhaps I should mention netting and ropes which float indefinitely in the sea, causing obstruction.

The second class, Schedule II, is made up of those substances that have a potential for causing damage, but which, with the correct precautions and supervision, can be safely deposited in the sea. Permits issued for Schedule II substances will specify locations, times, rates of disposal, et cetera, that will be compatible with the protection of the marine environment.

These schedules, honourables senators, can be changed and updated as new substances emerge or knowledge is gained requiring their amendment. Substances not included in these schedules are not immune from control as these also require a permit for dumping purposes.

In extraordinary circumstances where the safety of human life is involved, provision is made in the bill for substances to be dumped at sea without prior permit. However, a full report of such action and the circumstances involved will be required. The minister may, in addition, grant an emergency permit to authorize dumping action, if such action is necessary to avert danger to human health on land. The reporting of this dumping action, and if possible prior consultation with other states liable to be affected by such action, is covered in the bill.

Schedule III specifies the criteria to be followed in the issuance of permits. Again, it follows the pattern of the London Convention. Among the factors considered are the composition of the substance itself, the method of deposit, the characteristics of the dumping site, the existence of alternative methods of disposal, and the effect of such dumping on marine life, amenities and other uses of the seas.

The penalties for offenders who contravene the act will be assessed in accordance with the severity of the violation. The contravention of clauses 4, 5 or 6 on summary conviction carries the following penalties: for offences involving substances not listed in Schedule I or II, a fine of up to $50,000; for offences involving substances listed in Schedule II, a fine of up to $75,000; for offences involving substances listed in Schedule I, a fine of up to $100,000.

The contravention of clause 7, which prohibits the disposal of ships, aircraft, et cetera, in the sea, is punishable on summary conviction by a fine not exceeding $75,000 and failure to report dumping carries liability for a fine of up to $75,000.

The bill authorizes the government to detain, seize, or force forfeiture of ships and aircraft and to demand redress of environmental damage by polluters. The Governor in Council is empowered to make regulations required to carry out the provisions of the Convention and of the act.

The administration of the act will be carried out by Environment Canada, and will involve many other government departments and agencies, including the Ministry of Transport, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Department of National Defence, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In those matters concerning alternative land disposal situations, provincial organizations will also participate.

Honourable senators, as you know, the bill has undergone a thorough examination by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of the House of Commons, and by that house, prior to its arrival in the Senate. The passage of this bill will allow Canada to take her rightful place amongst those nations who have already finalized their ocean dumping legislation. Canada deserves to be in this elite group of world leaders.

The London Convention will come into force automatically after the deposition of the fifteenth instrument of ratification. As of this moment there are 13 nations that have ratified, and a number of others possess that capability through legislation. The Convention calls for the convening of an organizational meeting within three months of its coming into force. This meeting will decide on the administration and future shape of the Convention and will be open only to those nations that have ratified. It is important that the special coastal state interests of Canada be fully represented at this conference.

It is fortunate that the problem of ocean dumping is not of major proportions in our coastal waters, and we wish to see that this situation never develops. Canada's coastal waters and the resources therein are a heritage to be protected and fostered for generations to come, and this bill, honourable senators, is an important step along the road to the complete protection of our ocean environment.

If this bill receives second reading, I propose to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science but, frankly, only if honourable senators think that they would prefer to discuss it further.

Senator Connolly: Would the honourable sponsor of the bill tell us what courts would have jurisdiction in this connection? I take it, from a cursory reading of the bill, that it would be the courts of criminal jurisdiction in the nearest province or area. Would there be any jurisdiction, however, in the Federal Court to enforce the provisions of the bill?

Secondly, I notice that the bill deals exclusively, because of the Convention, with dumping of noxious materials into waters adjacent to Canada, and I ask this question only out of curiosity. Is there any similar legislation with respect to the dumping of materials from aircraft, for example, over land?

Senator Macnaughton: Speaking from memory, honourable senators, I think you will find somewhere in the bill—and I wish I could put my finger on it—a provision to the effect that the Federal Court will have jurisdiction. In Quebec I believe it would be the superior court. I am not sure what it might be in the rest of Canada. I think, however, it is mentioned in the bill.

Senator Connolly: It is only the Federal Court, as I read it. However, we can look at that in committee.

Senator Macnaughton: With regard to the second question, I do not know of any legislation dealing with dumping by aircraft over land. Perhaps that could be dealt with in committee.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN ACTS IN RESPECT OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Keith Laird moved the second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

He said: Honourable senators, the introduction of this legislation has been delayed somewhat, and perhaps I should briefly explain the reason for this delay which accounts for the retroactive feature in the bill.

This legislation which we now find in Bill C-47 was introduced first in the other place prior to the election which was held last year. If you go back far enough you will see that the last increase in judges' salaries was granted in 1971, and at that time the then Minister of Justice promised that there would be a review every three years. That review should have taken place last year, but because of the election it did not take place. For that reason we have the retroactive feature in this bill whereby the pay increases are introduced in two phases, the first to apply from April 1, 1974.

I have read the proceedings in the other place on this legislation, both in the house and in committee, and I can inform honourable senators that while the discussions were not lengthy they were extremely thorough. The bill was passed eventually, on division as it turned out, with not more than eight members opposed. So you will see that it has received in the other place a very substantial consideration, and that in itself may reduce somewhat the labours which we might otherwise have had to undertake in this connection.

Perhaps, in view of the various items included in the bill other than the salary increases, it might be as well if I were to explain now and dispose of those provisions respecting the provinces named. At the outset let me emphasize that where these changes are made in the judiciary of these provinces, in each instance the changes were proposed by the attorney general of the particular province and were provided for in each case, or at least so I am informed, insofar as legislative competence goes by appropriate provincial legislation. Therefore I think that in this respect I can say we are simply doing what has been requested of us by the provinces.

Let us take Alberta, for example. There the district court presently is divided into two divisions, one for northern Alberta and one for southern Alberta with a separate chief justice for each. Under the new structure there will be a consolidation of these division into one District Court of Alberta with a single chief judge although there is also provision for an associate chief judge. That disposes of Alberta.

In Newfoundland the supreme court presently consists of four justices, including a chief justice. The province does not have a court of appeal as such. The proposed legislation would create such a court of appeal consisting of three justices including the chief justice. The court structure in Newfoundland would therefore become similar to that of the other provinces.

The provisions concerning Prince Edward Island would consolidate the county court with the supreme court. That takes care of those provisions in the bill which refer specifically to provinces.

Now let us come to the main purpose of this bill, which is to grant salary increases to judges. I would draw to your attention that at the beginning of Bill C-47 you will find set out the proposed increases which, by the way, are to be introduced in instalments, the first instalment to date from April 1, 1974, and the second from April 1, 1975. The present salaries appear in the schedule to the bill. That enables you to compare what was and is currently being received by judges with what is proposed. Obviously it would take me the better part of an hour to go into all of this in detail, but if the matter is of particular interest to any senator he can check it in the legislation, and if the bill should go to committee it can be further checked there.

We must keep in mind that with these increases there is introduced a limitation which never existed before. From now on judges are restricted to earning $3,000 from extra-judicial functions such as royal commissions, surrogate court work and that sort of thing. In fact, I took the trouble over the weekend to check with certain county court judges to determine the amount of income they received from functions other than their strictly judicial functions. I found that many of them in Ontario—I am not saying this is true all across Canada—are making an extra $8,000 or $9,000 a year. So when you compare what their situation will be with what it has been up to now you will find that they are not coming out all that well as a result of the changes. The whole idea behind this limitation is to confine, as far as possible, judges to strict judicial duties, which I think you will agree is desirable when you consider that the courts are at the present time overloaded almost everywhere. This is a step in the right direction.

Another interesting sidelight on these increases is that in the other place Mr. Eldon Woolliams, who spoke very forcefully in favour of the bill, had taken the trouble to make a calculation of the effect that the income tax payable by the judges would have on the increases. The net effect is that if this bill becomes law—and here I do not intend going into all the details because they are set out in the House of Commons Hansard—roughly speaking, and not taking into account outside income if any, this is going to amount to an increase of only about 50 per cent of the amount granted. In other words, the income tax rate will be increased to the point where the judge will be left with only about half the amount granted as non-taxable income.

Furthermore, having in mind the provisions regarding county court and district court judges, I should draw to your attention that in almost every province their jurisdiction has been increased considerably. In Ontario, for example, as members who are Ontario lawyers know, county court judges can now hear divorce cases. That is one example of how their workload is being increased. I would ask you to keep that in mind when checking the tables and comparing the salaries proposed in this bill with those they are presently receiving.

I am sure I do not need to stress in this chamber that it is of extreme importance to make sure that we get the best men and women available on the Bench. I do not know of any segment of society that is more important for the proper operation of a country than a strong, independent judiciary. By the way, there are about 500 judges involved, so there is no astronomical monetary problem. But we have to keep in mind that we want to get from the Bar those lawyers who are the most competent for judicial duties. I am sure you are all aware that when we succeed in getting men of that calibre, they give up the opportunity for considerably greater earnings. So, it becomes extremely important that we do not shut out any person of high calibre who might be willing to accept an appointment to the Bench but cannot do so because of monetary considerations. However, I do not need to urge on members of this chamber the desirability of avoiding that.

• (2110)

I should point out that for several years now the process of selecting judges has been more scientific than in the past. Almost without exception, the appointments to the Bench in the last few years under both Conservative and Liberal governments have been good appointments. The reason is simple. No longer is it considered some sort of reward for political work, and a process is followed under which the advice of impartial people is taken. Probably most important is the fact that a committee of the Canadian Bar Association is fixed with the exclusive responsibility of advising the Minister of Justice on the suitability of persons whose names have been submitted to the minister for appointment to the Bench. I may say that there have been several instances where the present government appointed adherents of the other party, which I believe is known as the Conservative Party. I could mention names, but I believe we all know of these instances. Anyway, I am sure the same situation would prevail if the Conservative Party were to form the next government of the country.

Senator Forsey: NDPs have also been appointed.

Senator Laird: Yes. Although I should not mention names, there is Mr. Justice Osler in Toronto.

Senator Forsey: And Mr. Justice Berger.

Senator Laird: However, the process of selection has improved mightily since many of us commenced the practice of law, because there is simply more care exercised in ensuring that appointees, regardless of their political affiliations, will do the job as a judge.

If we did not have a strong judiciary, a cog would be missing in the machinery to maintain a stable society. Therefore, for all those reasons, obviously we had to treat very seriously a matter of economics in order to attract the best possible men.

I could mention some minor fringe benefits, if you will allow me to call them that, which are provided in this bill. For example, the expenses of judges who attend study sessions are now payable by way of reimbursement. Perhaps some senators do not know that, like lawyers and doctors and others, it has been the practice of judges to attend conferences and seminars in order to keep up to date in judicial matters and the administration of justice. The expenses incurred in attending these conferences and seminars have become burdensome, and these expenses will now be reimbursed.

A judge will now receive another benefit in the form of a removal allowance when he is required to change his place of residence to perform his duties. A county court judge may be asked to preside in a distant county, and the legislation provides for the payment of his expenses.

Another benefit under the bill increases the pension entitlement of a judge's widow from one-third to one-half.

You may recall that at one time we provided that certain judges could elect to become supernumerary judges—that is, at a certain age they could elect to become supernumerary judges and not be on regular duty but available on call. That privilege has now been extended to county court judges. In my opinion, this is an excellent amendment, because heretofore this applied in the main to superior court judges.

Honourable senators, those are the main purposes of this bill. I shall do my best to answer questions, but you may wish to leave detailed questioning until the bill is being considered in committee.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, Senator Laird told us that under this legislation the salaries of judges will be revised after three years. Would he tell us if there was any reference during the debate in the other place with respect to a possible indexing of the salaries of judges, rather than a revision after three years?

Senator Laird: I cannot recall that there was any discussion along that line. Over the weekend I read the debate on this bill in the House of Commons and the proceedings of the meetings of the committee, and I do not recall that suggestion being made. Please do not pin me down to that, but that is my recollection.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question. In establishing the number of judges in the provinces, what basis is used for the varying numbers? It is quite interesting to note that in Prince Edward Island, with a population of 105,000 or 110,000, there are seven judges; in Saskatchewan there are 32; in British Columbia there are 65, and so on. These numbers do not seem to bear much relationship to either the extent of the territory or the numbers of the population. There must be a basis, and my question is: what is it?

Senator Laird: It is based solely on the requests put forward by the provinces. In other words, a province decides it needs a certain number of judges, and it passes legislation, but that legislation cannot become effective until the Parliament of Canada passes legislation. I repeat, the numbers do not emanate from Ottawa, but from the provinces, and the custom is to carry out the wishes of the provinces.

[Senator Laird.]

Senator Langlois: It is based on the volume of litigation in each province.

Senator Laird: That is true. As Senator Langlois says, it is based on the volume of litigation, which makes the Prince Edward Islanders appear to be very litigious.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I congratulate my learned friend, Senator Laird, on a very simple, explicit and understandable explanation of this bill. If I may, I should like to add a word or two concerning Bill C-47?

In my opinion, we should keep in mind in these troublous times, when parts of Canada seem almost on the verge of anarchy, that it is essential above all else—and many honourable senators who have served in public life know what I am talking about—that we maintain a strong judiciary.

● (2120)

It is important that we have a powerful, strong judiciary, composed of men who are known to the public and to labour; men who are above reproach; men who are outstanding not only because of their knowledge of the law, but because of their strong, powerful characters; men who can see the highest reaches of the law and interpret it, and make ordinary people understand it; men who at the same time can appreciate the wants and needs of the working man and union member. This is all important. As a matter of fact, the very survival of our Constitution and our form of government, it seems to me, depends more than anything else upon a powerful, incorruptible judiciary.

Fortunately in Canada we have this. There has been only one exception that I know of. It was as a result of the report of a special joint committee of both houses, and a motion for an address to the Governor General, that that person resigned. That is the only instance I know of where there has been any talk of corruption among our judiciary.

Shakespeare said that if a man has it in his mind to be something, he should act the part. Such is the reputation of our judiciary that any person appointed to it knows at once that he has a great challenge to live up to, and he at once tries to act the part, and in time becomes that part. It is a marvellous thing that in Canada, as in England—not in the United States, and not in any other country, to the same extent—we have such a high class, incorruptible judiciary.

We cannot hope to get people to accept these offices unless we pay them adequately. I do not mean we should pay them what they have been earning at the Bar. They should be willing to make a sacrifice. In accepting the high and exalted position as judge—we all look up to judges, to the judiciary—they should be prepared to make a sacrifice just to serve Canada and, at the same time, to do good to their souls. I can say, from my experience, there are a great many people at this time—as they did during the time when I was parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice—who are giving up large incomes to become judges in order to serve Canada in the best way they know.

I shall not go into the sacrifice of income which some of them make, because it might be misunderstood outside this chamber. But thank God there are people in Canada who follow the British tradition in that when they have succeeded in the practice of law they are willing to give up the emoluments which go to a good lawyer by accepting a position on the Bench, where they serve for the rest of their working lives.

Senator Laird has improved tremendously since Senator Martin left the chamber. I say that not because Senator Martin was not a great leader—he was. All honourable senators know that I have the utmost admiration for him. I have known him since we debated together at Hart House 50 years ago. I think, however, my honourable friend was under the spell of a great man. He was his law partner. Now that Senator Martin has gone, he is himself—and an extremely able person he is. Senator Laird said there are 500 judges appointed by the Government of Canada, and I cannot help but think that in my province, Ontario—I hate to give credit to the Liberals, but they have carried on the tradition of the Diefenbaker government, and the Honourable E. Davie Fulton, in appointing the very best men to the Bench, be they Liberal or Conservative, although I must admit they are usually Liberal.

Senator Perrault: We appointed Fulton.

Senator Walker: And what a wonderful thing that was for you.

Senator Asselin: It should be the same in the Senate.

Senator Walker: Yes, it should be the same in the Senate. I know that Senator Perrault, the esteemed leader in this house, would like to see the Senate leavened by the presence of one or two distinguished Conservatives. It would really add tone to the place. If the Prime Minister, through Senator Perrault, wants names, I am ready to submit some. I agree that Mr. Justice Fulton, a delightful person, is an adornment to the Bench. It is a pity that during most of these past years he had the hang-up that he was going to be leader of our party. He wasted a lot of time at that. He is a very able man and is doing a good job.

On the Supreme Court of Ontario we have Chief Justice Gale, a tough, hard-boiled lawyer but a great administrator, whose sole ambition it is to get together the strongest group of judges, no matter whether they be Tory or Liberal—although they usually turn out to be Liberal—to have people on the Bench who are not at all interested in politics.

I speak of Ontario because that is my closest interest. I do not intend to appear before the courts again, and therefore I cannot be said to be currying favour. I have pleaded cases for 45 years, and that is long enough—and I guess the judges think so too. In Ontario we have the ablest court of appeal in history. Men earning $100,000, $150,000 and more per year have been appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal. It is a fantastically able court, and so is the High Court of Justice. I must give credit to the Honourable Otto Lang for some of the splendid appointments he has made. When we talk about the judiciary, we have to speak outside of politics. It is too serious a subject to be made a political football. Mr. Lang has done a good job, and Ontario has a magnificent supreme court.

My honourable friend, the former mayor of Montreal, would know whether or not this is so in Quebec. It is marvellous to see some of those judges stand up and be counted when the pressure is on in that great province, which we all love so much.

Our only regret is that these wage increases have to come up. They are embarrassing. They are embarrassing for this house and for the House of Commons. Goodness knows, it does not make any difference to me—my salary is assigned to the Receiver General anyway—and neither does it matter to many honourable senators. But why should there have been all that fuss about members of Parliament getting an increase? It seems to me, in retrospect, to be ridiculous.

It would also seem to me that if we oppose this bill to raise the salaries of these very able, dedicated men—I will not go into that again. Well, perhaps I should, briefly. The amount for the Chief Justice of Canada is $65,000 a year. Imagine that! Senator Goldenberg, that will be the day when you work for $65,000 a year. The salary of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada is to be $60,000 a year. Fantastic.

Senator Prowse: I would rather be a quarterback.

Senator Walker: Whatever that means, I thank my friend. The judges of today are extremely able men. The salaries of the chief justices and judges of the supreme and superior courts of the provinces are to be $55,000 and $50,000 respectively. For county court judges those figures are $48,000 and $43,000. I think that is a little high for county court judges. There are a good many of them, and some of them are not too distinguished. However, as far as the superior court judges are concerned—and I am absolutely sincere in saying this—they are a bargain, and let no one say they are not. I know that for a fact because I have been at the Bar for a good number of years. The Supreme Court of Ontario is a great institution of which I am very proud.

● (2130)

I must say that just as the Conservatives did justice by upholding the standard of the judiciary, so the Liberals are doing now—and what a wonderful way they have of deciding on appointments. The present government consults the Canadian Bar Association and the benchers of the law societies—I was one once—the governing bodies in the provinces. We were consulted, and are being consulted at the present time. In addition, there is a committee of judges to whom the Minister of Justice submits names. If the committee, after mulling over the nominations is not satisfied, it has no hesitation in sending them back. I know that Chief Justice Gale, chairman of the Ontario committee, often sends back recommendations. It is a wonderful system, and we can be justly proud of it. With all the chaos there is at the present time, we are in a sound position so long as we have an incorruptible, able and efficient judiciary.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, we were scheduled to meet after the Senate rises, but our witness Mr. Roy Atkinson, President of the National Farmers Union, has to catch a plane, and I thought that this motion would be some insurance for our committee if the Senate meeting were extended for an unusual length of time. The Minister of Justice has advised me that, after a thorough review of the judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal, he will make a decision as to whether an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is warranted.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cottreau, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code."—(Honourable Senator Prowse).

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I should like to yield to Senator Bonnell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Bonnell leave to proceed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, first of all I wish to thank Senator Prowse for yielding. I do not intend to take up much of your time but I do wish to make a few comments on this bill. My words are mostly words of caution. The Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs did a great job in influencing the committee. His statement in the last official report of the committee, in which he said that we are dealing in this bill and in this report with cannabis—not heroin, not opium or other drugs but cannabis and cannabis only—should be printed in large letters in newspapers across the country. We are not dealing here with some of the other major problems in Canada, problems involving alcohol, nicotine, heroin; we are dealing only with cannabis. I think it is obvious from a reading of the report that it does not suggest making the use of marihuana legal in Canada. Senator Goldenberg made that point quite clear in the final paragraph of his statement. Unfortunately, however, that does not seem to be the impression which has been created in the minds of people across the country. Therefore, we should emphasize and re-emphasize the fact that as senators we are not attempting to legalize the use of marihuana.

No doubt the press, always on the lookout for sensationalism, have done their best to come up with sensational headlines. Perhaps they have succeeded. Here are a few of the headlines taken from papers across the country. The Summerside Journal Pioneer of Prince Edward Island in its issue of Wednesday, May 28, said: "Senate Report Stops

[Senator Perrault.]

Just Short of Making Possession of Cannabis Legal." That type of headline is bound to give the wrong impression, especially to younger people who are more eagerly influenced by that sort of sensationalism. Indeed, many people do not read past the headlines. They do not read the small print. If one read the story through one would find that there was no suggestion that the Senate was attempting to make the use of marihuana legal, but that is the impression the headline gives.

Another headline reads: "New Law Gives Automatic Pardon for Possession of Pot." That means to most people that they can have all the pot they like, and, if caught, they will be pardoned. Another headline states: "Senate Proposes Easing of Marihuana Laws." Another one: "Senate Cannabis Report Stops Short of Legal Possession."

Basically, the newspapers from coast to coast give the false impression that the Government of Canada, and the Senate in particular, intend to make the use of marihuana legal and to pardon all those found in possession of it or trafficking in it or otherwise dealing with this drug.

I hope if my remarks today do nothing else they will have the effect to bringing to the attention of the press, and to Canadians from coast to coast, the fact that it is neither the intention of the Government of Canada nor the intention of the Senate to legalize the use of marihuana or the use of any other drugs.

Now that the control of marihuana is to be placed under the Food and Drugs Act, surely it is the responsibility and duty of the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces to inform, through advertisement or whatever other means of publicity, the citizenry of this country of the new research into the use of drugs including marihuana. Surely it is their combined duty to inform the citizens of this country of the dangers that can be inflicted by the continued long-term use, or even short-term use, of drugs including marihuana; to inform them of whatever dangers might exist for the next generation in the use of the drug so that these young people can benefit from this knowledge and will not continue under the false impression that marihuana is a harmless drug or that we as parliamentarians are softening our attitude and deciding that the drug is so harmless we should make it legal and pardon everybody who has possession of it or who traffics in it.

● (1420)

I want to support the report because I think the committee has done good work. It spent many long hours of work and has brought in a good report. I do not think that any report that they might have brought in would have pleased everybody; when they get to the stage that they can do that, they will no longer be senators.

As I have said, I support the report and I want to make it clear that if we adopt the report, we will not be voting for the legalization of marihuana in this country.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to keep you for any length of time, but I want to speak on this report to help make clear what the committee attempted to do and what we hope we have to some degree achieved.

It was not our intention to make marihuana legal. Two things should be made perfectly clear. The first is that every one of the substantial witnesses who appeared before us, who came and gave us opinions based on first-hand knowledge of the results of their researches, or researches that they had overseen, spoke to the effect that they were not ready to say that this is a harmless drug. Practically without exception every one of them said, "I have not used it nor do I intend using it." It served no purpose in their research to do so. Neither was any one of them prepared to take the risk that might be associated with its use. In other words, while they were not able to say it was harmful, or to what extent its use could be harmful. Not one of those substantial people who appeared before us was prepared to answer the question, "Is it harmless?" by saying, "Yes." They just would not give that answer. It seems to me that if they were not prepared to give that answer, then neither the committee nor the legislature has the right to tell the young people of this country who are being confused and who are experimenting with it that they can do so with impunity. There may or may not be some risk, but at this stage nobody can tell them that they can use it without risk.

The second thing that should be made perfectly clear is that out of every thousand people who use it, a certain percentage are going to get into trouble. It may simply be that they get into trouble because, being in a drug culture, they find it easy to get into other difficult situations. This is true of alcohol and of practically any other kind of drug you want to mention. Under those circumstances we were most anxious that anything we might say or do should not encourage anyone who otherwise had no intention of experimenting with this drug to take the risk and do so, because until a person tries it he does not know whether he will get into trouble or whether he can experiment with it with safety. The best advice we can give people, and we hope that this is reflected in our report, is to leave the drug alone. However, people being what they are, they will not all leave it alone and so we have another problem to deal with.

Honourable senators, we have been convicting about 22,000 or 24,000 a year, the vast majority of them being young people, for simple possession of small amounts of marihuana obviously intended for their own use. Now, it is obvious that a single experiment with marihuana is neither going to damn a person's immortal soul nor destroy his health. We do not know what damage might result from its continuous use, but we do know that one single experimentation is not going to do anybody any real damage. But, under the law as it now stands and as it will stand until a change is brought about, if a person gets caught with marihuana in his possession he runs the risk of incurring a criminal record which could follow him to his grave. It could interfere with every plan he might have or that anyone else might have for him. A criminal conviction could jeopardize his chances of ever becoming a member of any professional group in this country; it could close the door to him forever for all kinds of development; it could wreck his hopes for happiness in achieving certain goals and in making a contribution to society which he could otherwise make. It seemed that in many instances the severity of the penalties was doing damage far in excess of that which was done by a single or occasional use of marihuana in what I call "adolescent experimentation."

We have taken certain steps. First of all, we have increased the maximum penalty for trafficking. The penalties for simple possession, though not great, are still there. For a first offence, a person is liable to a fine of not more than $500 or, in default of payment, to imprisonment for not more than three months; for a subsequent offence he is liable to a fine of not more than $1,000 or, in default of payment, to imprisonment for not more than six months. So, there are no minimums for simple possession. This is because we felt that we should leave to the courts and to the judges the responsibility for dealing with each case in a way that would best serve the interests of the individual. We wanted to make it possible for a first offender to avoid a criminal record. We wanted to save the accused from going through life with a criminal record for a first offence of possession of marihuana where he has been discharged by the court. It should be made clear that getting rid of a criminal record will not be automatic nor will it apply in every instance. It will apply only in those cases where the judge hearing the case, or an appellate court reviewing his decision, comes to the conclusion that it is in the interests of the individual that a conviction not be registered and that the accused be given an absolute discharge, provided that in doing so it does no harm to society. In other words, a judge cannot grant these absolute discharges as though they are free gifts to be given away on Dominion Day, but he has a right to grant them where he deems it advisable. If he feels that something more serious is involved than mere adolescent experimentation, he has the power to impose certain penalties.

● (1430)

We are most anxious to give no encouragement to traffickers. That is why the word "give," which has caused some members of this house so much concern, is found in the definition of trafficking. It has been said, "This will catch the fellow who has a cigarette, and who is going to give his friend half of it or a drag on it. Surely that is not trafficking."

Honourable senators, let me tell you, as a defence lawyer, that I am satisfied that if the word "give" were removed from the definition of trafficking I could, on behalf of a client I might be defending, drive an army truck full of hashish right through the provisions prohibiting it in the Criminal Code. The removal of that word would open it up that much to any reasonably competent defence lawyer.

The presence of that word, however, places on the judge the responsibility of deciding how serious the offence is. If a young, foolish person, who has a life of promise before him, is found guilty of trafficking because he comes within this strict wording—which is provided to give the police the machinery necessary to catch the commercial trafficker—the judge may, because there is no minimum sentence, give that person an absolute discharge.

Senator Flynn: No, no pardon.

Senator Prowse: The honourable senator, with all respect, had every opportunity of attending the committee meetings. If he wanted to stay away, and insists on shouting out his ignorance, that is his privilege, and he is free to exercise it.

Senator Flynn: I say that you are wrong when you say that the judge can give exactly the same sentence for trafficking as for simple possession. That is what I am saying.

Senator Prowse: I said that we took the minimums out so that in a proper case the judge will not have to say, as judges have so often said in the past, that unfortunately his hands are tied; that technically the Crown has proved every element necessary to find the accused guilty; and that is what he had to do. Under this new law he can exercise the right he has under section 662(1) of the Criminal Code. At the present time the judge can give an absolute discharge, or he can make it a conditional discharge as well. So we have taken care, I think, to prevent the law, because of the severity which must be there for some persons, from causing greater damage than the harm it was intended to prevent—and this is what has been happening in some instances up to now.

This bill before us has been studied in the light of the evidence heard before the Le Dain Commission, which was the latest available. When the study began, I had a feeling that certain things had to be done, as did many other honourable senators. As a result of the evidence the committee heard, I now have something more than a feeling. I am now satisfied in my own mind that I know what we are doing, and why we are doing it, and I am convinced that in the circumstances this legislation is the very best that we can hope to have at this time.

It may be that continuing research into this question will provide us with additional information so that in the future we may consider it desirable to make further amendments. In the meantime, I ask this house, as speedily as possible, in the interests of the young people of this country and of the law enforcement agencies, to pass this bill, so that it may proceed to where it can be applied by the courts in which we have so much confidence.

Hon. George C. van Roggen: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak on this matter, but at the risk of being repetitious I should like to say a few words with regard to the question of the record being expunged automatically.

The headlines that Senator Bonnell referred to are not to be unexpected, because the press seldom gets anything straight. This is simply another example of where they have not taken the trouble to examine the wholly technical fault in our law, which I think Senator Goldenberg and his committee are to be congratulated for dealing with in this report, not only in so far as marihuana is concerned in this bill but also in so far as the criminal law generally is concerned.

The point I should like to bring to the attention of honourable senators is that the provisions of section 662(1) of the Criminal Code, providing that a judge may if he so wishes—and it is the judge's decision—give an absolute or conditional discharge, applies not just to people who are before him on a charge of marihuana but also to accused who are before the courts on any charge under the Criminal Code which calls for a sentence of less than 14 years. There are therefore an infinite number of charges under the Criminal Code with regard to which a judge can give an absolute or conditional discharge to the accused.

[Senator Prowse.]

It is the judge's decision, based on the evidence and the uniqueness of the circumstances of the particular case, and it only applies to a first offence. The law is as it now stands because the draftsmen, in putting that section into the Criminal Code, I would submit, did not take sufficient care. It does not deal with the expunging of the record under the Criminal Records Act. Therefore, even though you are given an absolute discharge by the judge, who intends that you should go away a free man, albeit convicted, you still have to go through the administrative procedure of making an application to have the record expunged, or at least withdrawn, under the Criminal Records Act. All the committee is suggesting is that not only in this particular case of cannabis but in the Criminal Code generally, when a judge sees fit to give a first offender an absolute discharge, his record should be discharged automatically rather than his having to wait for approximately a year for the bureaucratic machinery to work.

Let me give you a simple example of the kind of hardship that this can bring to bear on an individual to whom the court has seen fit to grant an absolute discharge. I had defence counsel in Vancouver bring to my attention six months ago the case of a young man charged, not with possession of marihuana but with another offence under the Criminal Code. He was given an absolute discharge by the court for a first offence on a minor matter. Around that time he had been awarded a scholarship to an American university, but because of the delay in getting the record expunged under the Criminal Records Act his record stood and he was unable to accept the scholarship and pursue his studies at that university.

● (1440)

With respect to the headlines saying that we are giving automatic discharges to people convicted of marihuana offences, I would say that in so far as this particular recommendation is concerned the committee is to be commended for simply bringing it to the attention of the government and recommending that the procedure be set straight by removing an administrative anomaly from our criminal law.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak at any length, because I have expressed my views on previous occasions on this matter of marihuana and other drugs. However, there are one or two principles I deem it my duty to enunciate at this time.

Before doing so, I would like to express my congratulations to the committee which has for weeks been dealing with this matter. Without being invidious, may I say a special word of tribute to Senator Neiman, who introduced the bill in this house, and to Senator Goldenberg and Senator Laird, who have borne, I think, the brunt of the responsibility of handling this matter in committee. Then, of course, the members of the committee—I am not a member, so I can say this quite freely—did work assiduously and in a dedicated way to try to make the best of this matter. May I also say I have been impressed, as I am sure other senators have been impressed, by the quality and sincerity of the arguments that have been made in this debate.

I think it can be said, without fear of contradiction, that no member of the Senate has a vested interest in marihuana.

Senator Perrault: I hope not.

Senator Rowe: But every member of the Senate has a vested interest in protecting the young people of Canada, and all the children and grandchildren in the nation.

Having said all that, I want to add that I do not think the bill introduced here goes far enough. I do not think the amendments go far enough, but I feel that they probably go as far as it is reasonably practicable to go, having due regard for the feelings of the Canadian people generally at this time.

I am sure those associated with young people will agree with me that there is widespread resentment, widespread rebellion, among the young people, particularly over what they consider to be a discriminatory and hypocritical approach by the older people of Canada to this matter of marihuana. They feel that perhaps what we are doing is covering up our hidden guilt, our inner guilt, for failure to deal with other more important problems, certainly more serious problems, particularly the two greatest drug problems that we have—the use or abuse of tobacco and alcohol. In the minds of tens of thousands of young Canadians there is a resentment over our failure to tackle these other problems.

Let me put it this way: There is resentment over the fact that we have diverted so much of our resources—whether it be the space occupied in penitentiaries, or the time of the courts of justice and of policemen and detectives—to this fairly innocuous drug. I say “This fairly innocuous drug” because it is fairly innocuous when compared with the overwhelming seriousness of the alcohol problem in this nation.

Is it any wonder? How do you expect first year or second year students at the universities here in Ottawa to feel about this when they know that tens of thousands of Canadian homes and families are broken up because of alcohol, and we have done nothing about it? I do not speak as a zealot in this matter; I am a user of alcohol. How can we expect them to feel anything else but resentment, and to regard us as being at best hypocritical, when they know that 70 per cent of all the thousands of highway fatalities in this country are associated with alcohol; that the figures given a few months ago by the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare—and nobody has disputed these figures—show that 60 per cent of all the murders in the United States are connected not with marihuana but with alcohol? Marihuana has not been generally associated with violence. There are tens of thousands of murders annually in the United States, and 60 per cent of them—and by implication this is true in Canada—are associated directly with alcohol.

I do not know the answer to that problem but I would suggest that that is a far greater problem than the one to which we have diverted so much of our resources in recent years.

Honourable senators, before I sit down, may I say I hope no one will misconstrue my remarks to indicate that I do not recognize the simple fact that the use of marihuana could be dangerous. I do not think there is any such thing as a harmless use of a drug like marihuana, but I do feel that such a piecemeal approach as we have been taking in this matter is not the answer. This is an important matter, a serious matter, but it is relatively a small part of the great social problem of the abuse of drugs—marihuana, tobacco generally, alcohol and, let us not forget, the so-called “legitimate” or “respectable” drugs that thousands of our people are hooked on. Marihuana is one part of a great social problem, a problem about which we are doing virtually nothing.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, if I understand it correctly, by speaking now I am closing the debate on the motion for the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: No, you are not closing the debate.

Senator Goldenberg: I will refrain from speaking now if I am not closing the debate.

An Hon. Senator: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator may speak twice. He obtained leave yesterday, so the honourable senator may speak.

Senator Asselin: He does not want to speak.

Senator Flynn: Would Madam Speaker put the question?

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, that this report be now adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Neiman: moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

OCEAN DUMPING CONTROL BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-37, to provide for the control of dumping of wastes and other substances in the ocean.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first of all to congratulate Senator Macnaughton for his presentation of the bill, which deals with a most complicated international problem. As I listened to him last night it dawned on me that we have at least one thing in common—both of us are located in polluted areas.

I recall reading not so long ago that the fish in the St. Lawrence and Ottawa rivers contain a high degree of mercury. Sudbury, which has no fame to claim for its rivers and lakes, nevertheless has been a fishermen's paradise for many years. Unfortunately, as I learned from the newspapers last week, of 30 lakes within a radius of 100 miles of Sudbury, only six can any longer qualify for good fishing. They are polluted by either fumes from mining or industrial wastes.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak today on this important piece of legislation, because it is vital to the health of the oceans of the world and of our own endangered coastal areas. Land-based resources provide the largest percentage of pollution in the marine environment. Therefore, the control of this major pollution source is a significant step in the protection of the marine environment.

This is a matter which all parties in the other place have agreed is of substantial importance to Canada, and to the long-range development of a program to protect the ocean environment, forming, as it did, the basis of discussion at the recent Conference on the Law of the Sea in Geneva. That conference called for stringent international standards respecting the prevention of dumping wastes at sea. Bill C-37 must be viewed in the context of discussions at the Law of the Sea Conference, and in the context of the wider ramifications of a global treaty for the use and protection of the oceans.

By participating in the London Convention on the dumping of wastes, Canada has signified her intention of working with other countries to clean up the world's oceans. This legislation will allow Canada to meet her international obligations. With one of the longest coastlines in the world, Canada is particularly vulnerable to ocean pollution, a respecter of no political boundaries. Our northern waters present special problems of preservation which should make us particularly wary of indiscriminate dumping. We must attempt to ensure that the standards we seek to preserve for our coastline are encouraged on a worldwide basis, if we are to prevent further degradation of the world's seas.

This bill does not deal with the major substances likely to prove toxic to marine life by prohibiting their release into the ocean environment. It does attach conditions to other substances by means of a permit system, however, and provides for reasonably severe penalties for contravention of those conditions.

Let me raise a few concerns which have occurred to me in relation to some of the provisions of Bill C-37. For instance, how overriding is the control exercised by means of these permits? What happens to substances not dealt with in the schedules? In the granting of permits, the factors to be taken into account are highly technical and require considerable knowledge in the making of a judgment as to whether a permit should be granted. To state another example, I wonder if we know how much dumping has occurred, where it has occurred, and of what kind and leading to what cumulative effect. Concentrations of substances may have already been introduced into the marine environment which, although far below the lethal level, may be responsible for reducing vitality or growth, or may be responsible for causing reproductive failures or for interfering with the sensory functions of sensitive marine life. Such changes would not be immediately apparent and, unless the tolerance levels were ascertained by a system of monitoring over a period of time, it would be difficult to attach the correct conditions to permit dumping.

The minister has complete discretion in the power to issue, vary, suspend or revoke permits, so that an onus is placed on the interpretation by the minister as to the stringency of conditions attached to permits.

Do we have enough scientific know-how to make these decisions, or should provision be made for back-up research, and the monitoring and surveillance of changing conditions in our coastal areas? Otherwise, how would it be possible to judge the effects of dumping or to distinguish sensitive marine ecologies from less vulnerable areas?

An especially important technical factor is the availability of other land-based methods of treatment, because alternative disposal must be an integral part of dumping control, as the minister mentioned in committee discussions. However, it is not clear that this problem has been adequately dealt with. If a habitual method of dumping at sea is banned then, unless other solutions are made available, pressure will remain to allow dumping privileges. Small municipalities, for example, may initially experience hardship because of the removal of their customary system of waste disposal which, traditionally, has been to dump the waste at sea by means of barges.

This leads into my next question which concerns the provincial role. The bill is binding on Canada and the provinces. There is no provision for consultation although, as I have pointed out, some municipalities may initially experience difficulties in conforming to the new requirements. I understand there have been some discussions with the provinces. However, it would seem imperative that these be conducted on an ongoing basis so that isolated coastal communities at least know what is required of them. In some cases these communities may in fact be the victims of wastes disposed in the sea, but as victims they will have no automatic recourse to be heard or compensated under the terms of this bill. The dumper has the mandatory right of appeal from a ministerial decision, but in the case of the public that right depends upon ministerial discretion—it is only if the minister deems it advisable that complaints by the public are given a hearing by the review agency. It is my feeling that the public is entitled to the right of review where its interests have been affected or grievously harmed. The United States legislation allows for public participation in the conviction of an offender.

Obviously, the choosing of this review agency is important. The bill certainly offers an appeal procedure that is more flexible than mere resort to the courts. However, the agency's strength will depend on its ability to maintain independence. I was gratified that the government acknowledged the need for the appointment of an independent chairman, and that will assist in ensuring the independence of this appeal agency.

I can understand that as an appeal agency, the review board cannot be expected to exercise any supervisory powers, but I feel it is unfortunate that a regulatory body was not provided for under the bill to carry out administrative functions concerned with surveillance and enforcement, and to which enforcement officers could be attached.

● (1500)

An independent dumping authority would be able to give its undivided attention to controlling dumping, since arrangements under existing agencies such as those under the Ministry of Transport and the Department of National Defence are not presently geared to the policing action that would be required.

After all, honourable senators, the legal sanction of this bill depends on the enforcement function. It is also not clear how liaison will be provided by the Department of the Environment with activities connected with international control of dumping. I note that the Minister of the Environment is now the minister designated for administering the law, and I hope that the ministry will be able to exert a strong position on the national and the international scene.

I share the concern of my colleagues in the other place that the use of the word "deliberate" in the definition of dumping may pre-empt control over accidental dumping. What kind of assurances do we have that all "accidental" dumping will come to the attention of the authorities since the only requirement to report is in the case of "emergencies"? I question whether it will always be possible to differentiate after the fact as to whether dumping occurred as a result of emergency or was solely an expedient measure.

I welcome the amendments introduced in committee which I think have clarified some points raised during debate in the other place and in committee, particularly in relation to the publicizing and reporting procedures and to the provision that analysts and inspectors must be qualified for the purposes of this bill. I hope in our discussions that we will be able to close some of the loopholes that remain in this legislation, since it is in such an important substantive area that it is worth taking the time to ensure that it does in fact do what it purports to do.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Macnaughton speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, the honourable senator opposite has raised a series of very interesting questions. While I could attempt to answer them, I know I would be doing so in an amateur way. I do not see why you should be content with amateur answers, when you can get expert answers to your questions in committee. Therefore, I propose, if this bill receives second reading, to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN ACTS IN RESPECT OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Laird for second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I want first of all to thank the sponsor of Bill C-37, Senator Laird, for his excellent presentation of the principles involved in this bill.

[Translation]

I should like to add that this bill sanctions, as was said, extremely important principles concerning the appointment of judges, their salaries, and also certain details about the conduct of judges in certain circumstances.

However, we should be proud to have the best judicial system of all the countries where some democracy still exists. As you know, in certain countries, lower court judges are elected by popular vote, and I do not feel it is the best way to have an independent judicial system.

Fortunately, in Canada, section 99 of our Constitution recognizes specifically the importance of the principle of independence of judges by setting their retirement age at 75, insisting on good conduct during their mandate, and their removal only on the request of both houses.

We are fortunate in this country to have a judiciary which is independent of the executive and the legislative power. This, I think, further sanctions the independence of mind and the discretion of judges in the discharge of their duties. It was said during the debate last night—and Senator Walker mentioned it—that because of their responsibilities, judges must be free of any financial concerns. Their workload prevents them, as you know, from seeking financial gains elsewhere. The restrictions on their financial assets are such that I think I can fairly say that at least four out of five judges live on their salaries alone without relying on other incomes, and while discharging their responsibilities they may have a family to support, and they may have long and short term financial obligations into which they entered before their appointment. If we want to attract to the bench highly competent, talented and qualified lawyers, I think they must be paid a reasonable salary. Thus, they would have some peace of mind in the important tasks they must perform for society.

Now, judges have had no increase since October 1971. I find the proposed salary increases extremely reasonable when one considers that the cost of living went up 32.8 per cent between September 1, 1971 and March 1, 1975.

● (1510)

[English]

If we look at the increases in the salaries of the judges of the different courts, I think it is evident that the government has kept the average to about 32.8 per cent. The Chief Justice of Canada will receive $68,000, an increase of 36 per cent. Other judges of the Supreme Court of Canada will receive $63,000, an increase of 40 per cent. The Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice of the Federal Court will receive $58,000, an increase of 32 per cent. The chief justice and associate chief justices of provincial superior courts will receive $58,000, an increase of 38 per cent. Judges of territorial courts will receive $56,000, an increase of 40 per cent. Other judges of the Federal Court will receive $53,000, an increase of 33 per cent. Other judges of provincial superior courts will receive $53,000, an increase of 38 per cent. Chief judges of county and district courts will receive $44,000, an increase of 46.7 per cent.

I spoke about this latter increase to Senator Walker last night, and he said it might be too much. However, they will receive $44,000, an increase of 46.7 per cent. Other judges of county and district courts will receive $40,000, an increase of 43 per cent.

I think these increases are very reasonable, and we on this side of the house support them.

[Translation]

If we do not pay our judges higher salaries, fewer and fewer competent lawyers will accept appointment to the bench. There is simply too much difference between what qualified lawyers can earn in private practice and what judges are making at the present time.

It would be extremely deplorable if we were led to believe that only those lawyers who do not succeed in private practice accept appointments to the bench. In Quebec, the bill provides for the appointment of four additional judges to the Superior Court. After discussing the matter with colleagues, as well as with judges of the Superior Court, I feel that number is still inadequate since the rolls of our superior courts are extremely heavy; long delays are inevitable before cases can be brought before the court. The provinces authorize increases in the number of judges appointed to their superior courts; to my mind, if the province of Quebec granted permission to increase the number of judges of the Superior Court to eight, this would meet the needs of the chief justices since, as I said a while moment ago, their workload is extremely heavy.

[English]

Another provision of this bill deals with annuities for judges and deceased judges' spouses. The bill proposes no change in the present rate of the pension payable to a judge upon retirement, which is two-thirds of his terminal salary, but does propose that the pension of a deceased judge's spouse be increased from the existing one-third of the judge's pension to one-half of that pension. This increase would bring the rate of a widowed spouse's pension more closely into line with that under many other pension plans. The new pension rate would be applicable not only to future cases but as well to spouses now in receipt of pensions. There are some 88 judges' spouses who are now receiving pensions of less than $5,000 per annum and the increase will go some distance to alleviating the economic hardship in such cases.

While the bill does not introduce any contributory feature for the pension plan provided for judges and their dependents, it is intended to review the policy on pensions before the Judges Act is next amended with a view to considering the appropriateness and feasibility of introducing a contributory element so as to bring the plan into line with the federal government's general policy on pensions.

I hope that when the government studies the new system of pensions for spouses of deceased senators and retired senators, they will accord it the same treatment as has been given to pensions for spouses of deceased judges.

[Translation]

I also believe the government established a new organization providing that there will also be in the future a Canadian Judicial Council that will be empowered, when requested by the Minister of Justice, to inquire into matters submitted either by the Canadian Bar Association or individuals, and to report to the Minister of Justice in order to review the manner in which judges must perform their duties.

I believe this is an excellent idea. The aim is not to create a police force that would supervise the judges' work. I believe, however, that increasing numbers of people in our society are criticizing judges, and accusing them with little or no reason. So these people will have an opportunity to air their complaints to the minister. In cases where the latter feels this is needed, he will ask the Canadian Judicial Council to make an independent inquiry and submit a report to the minister.

In my view, it would have been better to introduce cost-of-living indexing after the end of a three-year period of salary increase, as was done for members of Parliament. I believe it is humiliating for judges to have their salaries debated, as in the past and as was recently the case by members of the other place. It often happens that people do not understand the judges' role in our society. I think it would have been preferable to have introduced cost-of-living indexing into the act in order that increases would automatically follow the cost-of-living index. I also believe that an independent board or commission should make recommendations to the government on judges' salaries. The courts, in my view, should be considered an extremely important body. The dignity and integrity of judges must be respected, and I believe it would be more acceptable to the people if an independent group, non-partisan people respected by the public, were to make recommendations to the government on judges' salaries.

[English]

We have no objection to this bill being referred to the appropriate committee of the Senate. I spoke with Senator Laird last night, and he told me that he is ready to refer this bill to a committee for consideration next week. The Opposition agrees with this, and if a motion is introduced in the Senate to refer the bill to committee we will vote for it.

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Laird speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, there is really no need for me to say any more than about three sentences.

First of all, I am very grateful to two distinguished lawyers, Senator Asselin and Senator Walker, who have obviously analyzed this bill and come to the conclusion that it does have merit.

● (1520)

I will add this with respect to the point of view just expressed by Senator Asselin, that it has merit as a more appropriate manner of dealing with the remuneration of judges. I trust consideration will be given to this at the appropriate time, which I hope is not too far into the future.

In the meantime, it is proposed that only one witness, who happens to be the widow of a judge who died many years ago, will appear before the committee. A sort of special problem arises with respect to her and many others. I understand there are some 200 altogether. I had no idea that there were so many in this particular category.

In any event, having that in mind, and even though there is unanimity respecting this bill, honourable senators will understand why there is no alternative but to refer it to a committee. Therefore, if the bill is given second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I put a question to the honourable sponsor of the bill? I appreciate why the bill should go to committee, but does Senator Laird realize that the committee will not be able to do more than what is provided in the bill for the widows.

Senator Laird: I do, naturally, and there is merit in the suggestion that the bill need not go to a committee. However, I suppose that if there are people who wish to be heard, we should give them the opportunity if it is at all possible.

Senator Langlois: Then the grievance is put on the public record.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Laird moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ALLIANCE SECURITY & INVESTIGATION, LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill S-26, respecting Alliance Security & Investigation, Ltd.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, this bill aims at restoring the charter of Alliance Security & Investigation, Ltd.

This company obtained its letters patent in 1964. It got additional letters patent in 1965 and operated without any problem until 1967.

At that time some facts were not very clear. A notice was published in the official Gazette on June 17, 1967, and on June 22, 1968, a year later, to the effect that the charter had been cancelled for failure to produce the annual returns required under the act. Strangely enough, it seems that the returns to be filed with the Secretary of the Province of Quebec were indeed filed. Why were those for the federal department not filed? No one seems to know. Anyway, they have not been found at the department.

The company therefore got in touch with the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department to try to find an answer to the problem. They received from the department as well as from their own lawyer a notice saying that the solution was simple; it was only a matter of obtaining letters patent incorporating another company which would simply succeed the original company, and this is how the letters patent incorporating the Alliance Security and Investigation, Ltd., in 1968, were issued under date of August 16, 1968.

But the problem was that the relatively large assets of the company—about $500,000, I understand—were not transferred automatically to the new company. In fact, the shareholders were supposed to have received the assets; the assets were deemed to have been distributed among the shareholders, who had to consider the part made up by the accumulated surplus as income, and, consequently, to pay taxes on this surplus before it could be transferred to the new company.

Under the circumstances, to avoid a completely unfair situation, the only solution was to introduce this bill which cancels the dissolution notices and presumes that the company has not stopped operating since the date of the dissolution notices of 1967 and 1968.

This is the information that I have received from the lawyers of the petitioners. Anyway, as this bill must be referred to the committee, if the members of the committee wish to have further information, the petitioners and their lawyers will be there to provide it.

Under the circumstances, I therefore move second reading of this bill. The committee will have the opportunity to inquire further into the facts on which this bill is based.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, a simple question. Perhaps I should put it to the committee, but could not this situation have been corrected under the new legislation that is now before Parliament? There might have been a period of time after the cancellation of the letters patent of the corporation during which it continued to exist, and the object of this bill might be to legalize any action taken during that time. If Senator Flynn refers this bill to the committee, I shall be glad to get the answer there.

Senator Flynn: I think the final answer can be given to Senator Langlois by the committee. As for me, if I understand the new legislation correctly, that problem could be settled under the new act. But the corporation is governed by the old legislation. The new act cannot apply to a corporation that was dissolved under the provisions of the old legislation, and I think that the time limit within which it would have been possible to revive the company has run out because the interested parties thought that by obtaining new letters patent the situation would be straightened out. Unfortunately they were wrong and, according to my information, wrong advice given at the time by the department and attorneys is to blame.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1975

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, this short bill has a direct and obvious purpose. It is simply to provide for the representation in this chamber of a senator from the Northwest Territories and a senator from the Yukon Territory. This seems to be a logical sequence to the recent action taken by Parliament in providing for representation in the other place for an additional member from the Northwest Territories. I do not see that much can usefully be said in addition to what I have already said on the point about the contents of the bill, except to say that clause 2 simply makes it clear that such appointees to the Senate must reside in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, as the case may be, and must have the corresponding property-holding requirements as senators from any of the provinces in Canada.

The bill is short. I am in the hands of the Senate as to whether it should be referred to a standing committee. I am agreeable to its going there, if that is what senators wish, but I do not think it needs to. I shall do whatever is the wish of the house.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1976.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has indicated to me that he adjourned the debate so that I might participate at this time. I ask leave to proceed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it may seem odd, in the timetable of the passage of the estimates, for us to be still discussing them at this stage. On the other hand, we now know that we are to have a new budget very shortly. As I will indicate, the budget itself may have some important consequences on the main estimates as they were put before us and considered by the National Finance Committee.

In presenting the report of the committee, Senator Sparrow, the acting chairman, ended his remarks with these words:

It is incumbent upon all of us to ask for spending restraints in these times of high inflation, high unemployment and the potential loss of foreign markets.

I am sorry to say that the evidence in the main estimates, and a good deal of subsequent evidence, makes it clear that we may ask all we like, and as often as we like, for restraint in federal government spending, but there is not the slightest chance in the world that there will be any restraint. I say that with the full knowledge that the President of the Treasury Board, when before the committee, said that it was his hope—I am sure it was his serious hope, but nevertheless a fond hope—that he would be able to restrain the increase, as indicated in the main estimates spending, to 16 per cent.

Perhaps it is a comment on the times that we should have a government telling us that they might be able to restrain the spending increase to 16 per cent. I am quite sure there is not the slightest chance in the world that they will. That suggested restraint—or so-called restraint—compares with a 23.7 per cent increase in the year before last, and a 28.2 per cent increase last year. If that rate of increase, which I am sure will be repeated this year, goes on for yet another year, it will mean that in a four-year span government spending will have doubled. Even so, that is a fairly conservative prediction. The figures I have given are of increases from main budgetary estimates to main budgetary estimates. To these we must yet add loans, investments and advances, and then, in due course, the supplementaries.

What stands out in my consideration of the main estimates is the fact that they represent only part, and are far from being the whole, of known government spending intentions. I emphasize the word "known," because there are known expenses or spending intentions which do not appear in the main estimates. There are reasons given for that, of course, but I can only emphasize that when we have a report from the committee which says that government spending this year is expected to be $28.2 billion, the fact is that the government already knows that it is going to be spending billions of dollars more than that.

I say "billions" because we have the evidence before us. The main estimates last year, which were discussed in our committee and presented here, indicated that the budgetary expenditures would be $22 billion. The estimates added some non-budgetary expenditures, bringing the budgetary total up to $23.2 billion. Then, in the course of the year, another $5 billion was added in supplementary estimates. Just to indicate the unrealism of the figures put before us, the increase, main budgetary estimates to main budgetary estimates, is no less than $6 billion this year.

I say this to support the statement that I see no evidence whatsoever of restraint in federal government spending. If there is the same magnitude of increase this year as there was last year, we will end up with a figure of government spending of not $28.2 billion but $36 billion or more. This is on the assumption that the loans, investments and advances will be about as indicated, and that the supplementaries will be about the same as last year. But there is some indication that they will be more.

● (1540)

The main estimates make no provision whatever for the deficit in the old age security fund. Last year it amounted to $400 million. For many years it was in balance. This phenomenon of the old age security fund being out of balance is a new one for us. What that figure will amount to this year, I do not know, but it will be substantially more, and that has not been provided for in the estimates.

Last year the unemployment insurance fund deficit was over $900 million, and the main estimates provide for a deficit this year of $890 million. Yet all the evidence is that the deficit is going to be over $2 billion, and this despite the fact that the hopeful provision in the main estimates is for less than $1 billion.

Honourable senators, when we look at these figures it is fair to ask: Where does the money go? In fairness, I should say that all of the expenditures, and all of the increased expenditures, are not necessarily avoidable. I do not want to be misunderstood or to be taken as suggesting that every increase in expenditure could have been avoided. An obvious example is the very substantial apparent increase in government spending related to the oil equalization subsidy programs. As is well known, this is a program by which a tax is imposed upon exports of oil, and the revenues from that are used to equalize the consumer cost of oil across the country. It is proper say that this is a bookkeeping item because it is the American taxpayer who is paying that billion and more dollars for the equalization. So there are such items. No one will complain greatly if the family allowances estimates are up, as they are, and there are other items, of course, where the increase is understandable.

However, I say again that we see no evidence of deliberate restraint in other items where restraint can be exercised. I know it is the custom for those who object to this kind of statement to say, "Well, tell us where you would cut," the purpose being, of course, to put anybody who suggests restraint on the spot. I am not going to indicate my answer to that at the present time. I would simply refer anybody who is interested to scores of statements by economists and learned societies, all of whom have listed their own suggestions for justifiable cuts in government spending. There is no dearth of advice to the government on that but, unfortunately, there is no likelihood of that advice being taken.

Where does the money go? The oil subsidy program, of course, is one place. There are also, of course, fiscal transfers to the provinces amounting to, I think, well over $2 billion. Again, it would not be fair to charge this to federal government spending because actually the money is spent by the provinces. The federal government merely collects the money. But even making these exceptions, we still have what to me is an intolerable increase in federal government spending this year.

I have mentioned the oil subsidy program and the fiscal transfers to provinces, the latter being part of the item of $4.6 billion for economic support. The largest single standing item is in health and welfare, and the other items in what are called the eleven traditional categories of government spending are as follows:

| | ($ Billions) |
|--------------------------------------|---------------|
| Health and Welfare | 7.8 |
| Public Debt | 3.5 |
| Defence | 2.8 |
| Transport and Communications | 2.0 |
| General Government Services | 1.4 |
| Internal Overhead Expenditures | 1.1 |
| Foreign Affairs | 0.7 |
| Cultural and Recreational Activities | 0.7 |
| Educational Assistance at | |
| Post-secondary Level | 0.67 |

The public debt is going up all the time.

I point out that the committee report once again criticizes an extraordinary item under Foreign Affairs, and that is the non-lapsing authority of the funds that have been appropriated for CIDA, the Canadian International Development Agency. It is an extraordinary thing that any crown corporation, agency or government department should be permitted to carry over non-spent funds year after year when the requirement of the Financial Administration Act is that this should not happen. How does it happen? Well, there was an appropriation act in 1965, and it is on the authority of that appropriation act—not a regular act of Parliament—that CIDA keeps all appropriated money every year knowing they are not going to spend it in that year, and spends money that is appropriated this year sooner or later at their discretion. I mention this because there have been serious criticisms of the general operations of CIDA, and it is my view that this kind of negligence on the part of government management is one of the causes of that criticism and some of the troubles. If CIDA were required to turn back the money it has not spent, it would certainly be in a much better position to examine the efficiency of its operations.

I have mentioned the old age security account. There is no provision for the deficit, whatever it may be. The reason for that, of course, is that the act requires that the deficit be assessed at the end of the year, and there is no way of knowing what it will be until the end of the year. However, there is to be a rather interesting change in financial management. We were told in committee that it is the intention of the government to incorporate the old age security fund in the general revenues, so that presumably next year we will have that kind of provision in the main estimates.

Honourable senators may be interested in knowing that the total payout last year of the old age security fund was $4 billion, covering almost two million Canadians. Fifty-nine per cent of those beneficiaries were in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement. This is a remarkable figure because, as you are aware, the guaranteed income supplement was the result of a recommendation by a committee of the Senate. At that time nobody could have even guessed that as high as 59 per cent of all old-age pensioners would be in a position to qualify on a needs basis for a supplement to the old age pension.

● (1550)

The CBC situation, which comes into these estimates, is also interesting. The operating deficit this year is $353 million.

Senator McDonald: Sell it.

Senator Grosart: I hoped that Senator McDonald would perhaps contribute some such suggestion, because I think a good case could be made out for it.

Senator McDonald: I would give it away.

Senator Grosart: A case can be made out against it too, of course, but anyway the fact is that the CBC deficit is $353 million.

There are other deficits of crown corporations which may interest honourable senators. Here are a few: Atomic Energy of Canada, $94 million; the National Capital Commission, $41 million; and the Cape Breton Development Corporation, $28 million. From the reaction on my left, I imagine that would be perfectly justified.

Senator Macdonald: More than justified.

Senator Grosart: Then we have the National Arts Centre with a deficit of $7 million; the Crown Credit Corporation, $5 million; and—this surprises me, because I did not realize it was still in existence—the Company of Young Canadians, $5 million.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): How about the CNR?

Senator Grosart: The CNR is not in this category of crown corporations. I know of nobody in the house who is more of an expert on the cost of the CNR to the taxpayers, even though it does not appear in that form, or in total form, in the estimates, than Senator Fournier, and I hope that now that he is back with us he will renew his watchdog role in connection with all our national railways.

The case for restraint is based on the fact that the take by all levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—out of the national productivity is now well over 40 per cent. This is a serious problem, and it is becoming increasingly serious as that percentage rises, because, speaking generally, it is a fact that national productivity comes mainly from the private sector. The public sector does add some productivity, but it is a very small proportion in relationship to that of the private sector.

When we face the facts—and perhaps we will hear from Senator Lamontagne later on this—we find that the major facing our economy today is our failure to maintain regular increases in national productivity. This is a long term problem. In fact, the level of increase in productivity over the last 20 years has been disappointing, and continues to be disappointing.

We have other problems which point out how essential restraint in government spending is. The evidence is everywhere than non-restraint in government spending—and I am not merely speaking of the federal government, although it happens to be the leader in increased spending at the moment—is a major, if not the major, contributor to inflation. We have the dual problem. Like everybody else, the federal government says, "We need to spend more money because it is not the same money but, on the other hand, we do not like inflation." Yet the evidence is abundant on all sides, and the government has been told so over and over again that government spending is a major factor, if not the major factor, in the problems facing our economy, as it attempts to pull out of the recession of the last few years.

At the present moment the level of economic activity in Canada is less, when adjustment is made for inflation, than it was a year ago. Unemployment is likely to reach levels we have not seen since the thirties. Our merchandise trade account is deteriorating rapidly, and, as I said, there is, despite temporary cycles, a steady decline in overall growth of productivity lasting over many years.

I have suggested that there is abundant evidence that the federal government, and other governments, are major contributors to inflation. I would like to quote as one source, which is quite typical, the Canadian Economic Policy Committee, which is completely impartial, made up as it is of a few representatives of government, some from business, some from labour, some public servants, and experts of various kinds. In a recent publication it said this:

One of the principal causes of our current problems is a lack of restraint on the rate of growth in total government expenditures. The fact is that the rate of growth in total government expenditures over recent years is unsustainable without serious inflation. Specifically, the target should be that total spending on goods and services by governments at all levels should not be allowed to expand at a rate more rapid than the overall growth potential of the economy.

This is in fact what the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has been urging for at least five or six years to my knowledge, although in somewhat different terms but based on essentially the same principle, namely, that the government should not try to take out of the economy each year any more than the economy itself produces; otherwise, the result is bankruptcy. Governments do not go bankrupt in the same way as firms do, but governments around the world today are going bankrupt. I am not suggesting that we will, since we are in the fortunate position of having one of the strongest economies in the world. And why not? We have a net self-sufficiency in oil, and we have resources which are the envy of the world. In fact, one wonders why we have any problems at all. People of other countries, to whom we talk from time to time, just cannot believe that a country with apparently everything going for it, such as Canada, still has serious economic problems.

I have said that the difference between the main budgetary estimates, plus the loans, investments and advances, of last year and those of the year before was between $23 billion and $28 billion. In other words, last year there was an increase of $5 billion. There is a prediction that this year will be $6 billion, but who knows?

I think one of the problems that faces us in the Senate is that we look only at the main estimates. According to our rules, the main estimates are referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and the committee reports back. This, according to our current theory, absolves the Senate from any great responsibility of taking too hard a look at the estimates. Unfortunately we do not, as a normal practice, refer the public accounts—that is, the national accounts—or the auditor general's report, to that committee.

This has sometimes surprised me, and I think the acting Leader of the Government, with his usual care for such matters, will be interested when I say to him that this is another of those cases where we pay no attention whatsoever to our rules. Our rules require that the national accounts and the auditor general's report be referred—the word is “shall”—to that committee. I am aware that the Rules Committee is now considering a complete revision of the rules. I sometimes wonder if we should suggest to them that it might be well to have an appendix attached to the rules, saying, “The following rules are in the rule book, but we do not keep them and we have no intention of keeping them.”

Perhaps, in due course, the acting Leader of the Government will take this matter up—I hope he will—and find out if there is some reason why for all these years we have paid no attention to rule 67(h). I shall not bother to read it, but I think, in the light of what I have said, that it lays an imperative upon us.

● (1600)

Honourable senators, I conclude by calling to your attention once again the very wise words of Senator Sparrow in presenting the report:

It is incumbent on all of us to ask for spending restraints in these times of high inflation, high unemployment and the potential loss of foreign markets.

I am not going to suggest that the asking will do any good, but it never does any harm to ask.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, due to the lateness of the hour and the fact that we have at least one committee meeting after the Senate rises this afternoon, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1975

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on second reading of Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it may be merely coincidental, but this bill, designated as Bill C-3, is similar in purpose and in title to a bill that I had the honour of introducing in the Senate two and a half years ago as Bill S-3. There is a long history to this bill. A similar bill was introduced originally in the other place by the honourable member for the Yukon. The bill that I introduced here was not dealt with in the normal way, for reasons that I imagine concerned the wisdom or otherwise of the management of the business of the Senate. The end result is that, whatever the reasons may have been, this very important measure has been delayed some two and a half years.

I had hoped at the time I introduced the similar bill that it might have been dealt with much sooner so that this very necessary reform, involving the composition of the Senate, could have been proceeded with at that time.

The bill in its present form is the subject of the usual message from His Excellency the Administrator, recommending to the House of Commons an increase in the maximum number of Senate seats from 110 to 112, which is consequential upon and necessary having regard to the main purpose of the bill, to provide for the summoning of two new senators, one each from the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Honourable senators will recall that both these important areas of northern Canada have been represented in the House of Commons, in the case of the Yukon Territory since 1902, and in the case of the Northwest Territories by a series of acts extending the territories in 1947, 1952 and 1964. The composition of the Senate as presently constituted by regional breakdown is well known. But perhaps the history of representation in the Senate in this particular area is not quite as well known, so it may be well to recall that an amendment to the British North America Act passed as long ago as 1886 provided for the appointment of senators from parts of Canada other than those at that time organized as provinces. At that time, of course, the areas comprising the Yukon Territory, the Northwest Territories and what are now known as the Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were not organized as provinces.

As a result of the 1886 act, two senators were appointed representing what was then known as the Northwest Territories, that is to say, the whole area comprised of the two existing territories and the three provinces I have named.

[Senator Langlois.]

In 1904 this representation was raised to four, and in 1906 Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were given four senators each when the latter were organized into provinces. By 1916 this was increased to six each, making the entire western area of four provinces a Senate region in the same sense that the Atlantic provinces, and Ontario and Quebec are Senate regions.

There was at one time a question raised as to constitutional authority, and this now appears to be resolved in relation, perhaps, to the 1886 act which did give authority to the Parliament of Canada to appoint senators from these areas.

The well-known amendments to the British North America Act of 1949, conferring additional powers on the Parliament of Canada, have also been invoked, and may or may not constitute sufficient authority for the passage of this bill by the Parliament of Canada. Honourable senators will also recall that the recommendation in this bill is very much in line with the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution on which Senator Lamontagne and Senator Molgat served with such distinction. The recommendation of the joint committee was that there should be two senators each for the two regions, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories; but that was consequential on their general recommendation of an increase in the number of senators to 130 to provide, as honourable senators will recall, for direct representation in the Senate from the provinces.

Questions have been raised in discussions outside this place. One is perhaps the problem of the $4,000 property requirement for a senator. It has been indicated that the summoning of a senator from each of those territories may cause some problems.

As the House of Commons member representing the Northwest Territories pointed out, the average native income today in the Northwest Territories is about $1,000. It is therefore unlikely that a great many of the residents would be able to qualify. I understand that some steps will be taken in this matter; but they probably could not have been provided in this act, but may require a more substantial change, in constitutional terms, to the British North America Acts of 1867 to 1975.

The discussion in the other place took the usual form, and comments were made on both sides, some of which would, to my mind, be in keeping with the viewpoint of most senators, although some emanating from one particular party might not be. Surprisingly, the member for the Northwest Territories was not in favour of this bill. He favoured using the money involved to appoint an ombudsman, who would have more direct contact with the territories and those who might have the management of their affairs.

Another matter raised, which will be of interest to honourable senators, was that one of the advantages of the Yukon and Northwest Territories being represented in this chamber was that when the time came for Senate reform, they would be in the Senate, as members of the Senate, and thus able in one way or another to influence that reform. I am sure this comment will interest the Leader of the Government, because there have been a good many suggestions made to him by senators that if we are to have, as I am sure we all agree we should have, Senate reform, the senators themselves should have an opportunity of being heard.

I do not know whether he has anything in mind in that regard, but I would remind him that during discussion on this bill there was suggested the desirability of having a Senate input into the discussions on Senate reform before others make decisions. I am sure he has that in mind. I hope he will expedite the provision of an opportunity for senators to express their views in a formal way.

The question of those who will be appointed was also raised. I will not go into that except to say that one suggestion, of course, was that it would be highly desirable, particularly in the case of the Northwest Territories, that a native—in the sense of one of the two classes of original inhabitants—be considered. If that were so, I am sure we would all welcome the addition to our ranks of a senator or senators who represented the first Canadians.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to make a very brief comment on this bill, beginning with the congratulations that I think are due to the Honourable Senator Grosart for having initiated the action which has now taken place. It is not often, perhaps, that members of the Opposition in this house exercise such a persuasive influence upon the Government of Canada and I think Senator Grosart has achieved, if not a first in this respect, perhaps one of the most notable victories scored by a member of this house and especially a member of the Opposition.

I hope very much that when the appointments come to be made the government will exercise very special care in making them. This is an opportunity, I think, to add very considerably to the quality of the membership of this chamber, to bring into the chamber senators of a background and experience and knowledge which perhaps almost none of us in this chamber have at present.

I endorse what Senator Grosart has said about the desirability of having a representative of the original population of the Territories. This seems to me highly desirable and I feel also that this is an opportunity for the government to give very special consideration to the appointment of someone who is not—at least one of these two senators who is not—of the government's own political party. We have often heard pleas in this house for the strengthening of the official Opposition or the strengthening of the independent membership of the house. I think this is a particularly favourable opportunity for the government to take this into consideration—less inhibited than perhaps sometimes by pressures from within the party of the government supporters.

I feel it is particularly desirable because of the rather childish and abusive remarks that were made by members of a certain party elsewhere when this bill was under discussion. I think it would be peculiarly unfortunate if a handle were given to any of these people to say that some mere party hack had been appointed to either one of these senatorships. The charge, of course, might or might not be justified. But I think that every possible care should be taken by the government to see that in making these appointments people of very superior qualifications, special qualifications, special knowledge, special eminence and special independence should be appointed. I think this will mean that the addition to our ranks from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories will be particularly valuable.

Honourable senators, I want to make just one or two comments by way of footnote on certain remarks that Senator Grosart made, where he surprised me somewhat. I think that he is surely not very well advised by his legal advisers if he feels that there is any doubt whatever about the jurisdiction of this Parliament to pass legislation of this kind, or indeed any legislation dealing with the Senate. It seems to me that it is quite clear that under the British North America Act, section 91, head 1, the amendment introduced and passed in 1949, the Parliament of Canada can do absolutely anything that it wants to—in pure law, that is—about the Senate. If it wants to reduce the property qualifications either for the Yukon or the Northwest Territories or anywhere else, it is at perfect liberty to do so, as far as the law is concerned, to the best of my knowledge and belief. I know that I speak in the presence of a great many learned members of the legal profession, and I speak subject to correction by these gentlemen, but I am quite confident that in fact the courts would uphold any legislation of this sort.

I know it is sometimes said we should not make any changes in the constitution of the Senate without the consent of the provinces, but this is not in my judgment a legal requirement. As far as the pure, strict law goes, I think we can do absolutely anything we want to in this Parliament of Canada in regard to the Senate. We can abolish it, we can raise the qualifications, we can lower them, we can provide that only red-headed people can be appointed, we can provide that only people with turned-up noses can be appointed. We can provide for anything that we want to. We can increase the numbers, we can reduce the numbers.

Honourable senators, the other footnote that I wanted to mention had to do with a slight slip of the tongue by Senator Grosart when he spoke, twice I think, of the Province of Manitoba as not having been organized in 1886. The act of 1886 provided, of course, for the representation of parts of the Province of Manitoba—because the present Province of Manitoba did not get its present limits until the act of 1912. But the Province of Manitoba existed certainly in 1886, and had representation in the Senate in 1886.

● (1430)

I thought that historical footnote ought, perhaps, to be mentioned, although it is, of course, quite incidental, and I know it was a mere slip of the tongue on the part of Senator Grosart, whose knowledge of these matters is encyclopedic.

Senator Grosart: The honourable senator will not mind my saying that I was thinking of it as the postage stamp province, as it was, and was referring to the large territory which is now Manitoba.

Senator Forsey: Exactly. In fact, at that time even certain parts of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec were part of the Northwest Territories, Ungava and Keewatin. The act of 1886 applied to an enormous extent of the country—everything but the Province of British Columbia, old Ontario, old Quebec, the Maritime provinces, and the postage stamp province of Manitoba. All the rest of the country was part of the Territories. So, the act provided for the representation of an enormous part of the country, stretching from the Labrador boundary, then undecided, clear to the Rocky Mountains and, of course, to the Arctic Ocean.

Those were the few points I wanted to make about this legislation, honourable senators. The main one, of course, was the care which I hope the government will exercise, the substantial, great care, the special sense of responsibility, which I hope the government will exercise, in making the appointments from these two territorial parts of Canada when this bill goes into effect.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am in the hands of the house as to whether or not this bill should go to committee. For my part, I do not see any necessity for referring it to committee.

If that is the general consensus, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill S-27, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. Although I cannot call this bill a "simple" bill, for obvious reasons, it is at least a simplified bill. By way of explanation, I say that because it had been contemplated to bring forward a bill with additional and particular provisions dealing with the administrative structure of the corporation. However, it was decided to postpone such further amendments until a later date in order to allow due consideration. It is likely that in the very near future another bill regarding this corporation will be initiated in the Senate, or will come to us from the other place.

Before proceeding with this legislation I should like to add that when I studied it I was vividly reminded that when the corporation was born I had the honour and privilege to be the parliamentary assistant to the then Minister of Transport. That was some 20 or 22 years ago.

Senator Flynn: Is that so?

Senator Langlois: I was also reminded that I had the great honour to represent Canada at the splicing ceremony and the inauguration of the first trans-Atlantic telephone cable off the coast of Newfoundland, together with representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States, on board the British cable ship Monarch, and at the shore power station at Clarenville, Newfoundland. I also had the honour to participate in the first exchange between the station in Clarenville, Newfoundland, on this side, and of the sister station in Oban, Scotland, on the other side of the Atlantic.

[Senator Forsey.]

A few weeks ago I was vividly reminded of that episode when a friend of mine reported to me on his return from a business trip to Africa that he had seen in a theatre in Abidjan, the capital of the Ivory Coast, the documentary made by the National Film Board of this splicing ceremony.

Having made those preliminary remarks, I should like to revert to the bill before us, and add that it merely provides for a change in the name of the corporation, which is now known in English under the name of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, and in French under the name of la Société canadienne des Télécommunications transmarines. I must say that I never liked the French translation of the name, because in some way it tends to indicate that the scope of the operations of this important Canadian corporation is limited to the operation of submarine or underwater cables, either telephone or telegraph.

However, the operations of the corporation are not so limited. I therefore welcome the change in the name from "Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation" to "Telelobe Canada," which would be used in both French and English.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps it should be "Universe-Canada." After all, we can now communicate with the moon.

Senator Langlois: That is a good point. When the second bill I referred to is before us, my honourable friend will then have a splendid opportunity to make his suggestion.

The second purpose of the bill is to change the appellation of the president of the corporation. From now on he will be known as the president and chief executive officer rather than as the president and general manager. That is a small change which is merely in keeping with modern practice and usage.

I doubt that there will be any opposition to those two changes in the act. In concluding my remarks I simply commend the bill to the favourable consideration of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I would move the adjournment of the debate in order to study the name.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL BANK OF CANADA—REPORT ADOPTED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Bill S-24, intituled: "An Act to incorporate the National Commercial Bank of Canada". —(Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C.).

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Macnaughton, I move the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Laird: If you want an explanation, I shall be pleased to give one.

Senator Flynn: I think you should explain the bill for Senator Grosart's benefit.

Senator Laird: I hesitate to use a particular adjective in connection with the brevity of my explanation but, in few words, this bill was presented with the proposed corporate name, in English, "National Commercial Bank of Canada," and in French, "la Banque Nationale de Commerce du Canada." Certain objections were raised to the name in French, particularly by the Banque Nationale du Canada—

Senator Flynn: Banque Canadienne Nationale.

Senator Laird: Yes—for reasons which are obvious.

• (1440)

Consequently, while the bill was approved by the committee because there is nothing wrong with it, some discussion did ensue, and some evidence was taken, on the matter of a name. The name that is now recommended in the report, after a good deal of negotiation, is apparently satisfactory to all concerned, including the existing banks. The new name proposed in the report is, in English, "Canadian Commercial and Industrial Bank," and in French, "Banque Commerciale et Industrielle du Canada."

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Langlois: With leave of the Senate, I move third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that this bill be now read a third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

COMBINES

PLANNED TAKEOVER BID BY POWER CORPORATION OF ARGUS CORPORATION—ADVISABILITY OF REFERRING MATTER TO A COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE—INQUIRY DROPPED

On the Inquiry of Senator Benidickson:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to a planned takeover bid by Power Corporation of Canada Ltd., of Argus Corporation Ltd., and the advisability of referring the matter to a standing or special committee of the Senate to ascertain if such a takeover, if successful, would be in the public interest; and generally to inquire into the effect of growing corporate strength vis-à-vis the Canadian consumers resulting from other such takeovers, conglomerate ownerships, mergers, etc.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I beg leave under, I believe, rule 23, to drop this inquiry. Perhaps I might refresh the minds of my colleagues about the circumstances of the introduction of the inquiry, however.

This occurred on the day that we were adjourning for the Easter recess. I read early that morning, at 6 or 7 o'clock, of a possible merger of these rather large corporations. I felt that such a merger might have some effect on consumer interests, and I engaged quickly in conversation with some of my colleagues. It will be recalled that the Senate was to meet unusually early, at 10 o'clock in the morning, on that day, and I decided that something of the nature of this inquiry was necessary, since it was my conception that a joining, or association, of corporations of this size in Canada might not be in the public interest—would not, for example, be permitted in the United States. Everything was done very hurriedly because, as I have said, we were to meet at 10 a.m.

I simply want to say that since then—and I was out of the country for a short time after the house resumed its deliberations following the Easter recess—the Prime Minister has decided that in large part the essence of what is proposed in this inquiry would be studied by a royal commission headed by Mr. Robert Bryce, who has perhaps unequalled experience in government service. I am very pleased with that decision. I think it is better than what I had in mind.

I might interject here that the Parliamentary Library research branch was consulted, and in the recess it did most helpful work, which will be made available to Mr. Bryce.

I suggested in my inquiry that there might be a referral of the matter by the Senate to a standing committee, or to a special committee. I think, however, there might have been some quarrel about what we might have done in that respect. The Senate, to some degree, is suspect in its relationship to business, and so on, and I am delighted that a royal commission has been appointed.

I thank those of my colleagues who helped me between 9 and 10 o'clock in the morning on the day in question in framing this notice of inquiry.

If I have leave of the house to do so, I would, pursuant to rule 23, drop this inquiry. I am extremely delighted that the Prime Minister has decided to look into the merits and demerits of large business operations. I think this satisfies my purpose, the preparations for which had to be carried out in such haste because we were about to adjourn for the Easter recess.

Honourable senators, may I have leave to drop the inquiry standing in my name?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would not want to give leave to Senator Benidickson without attempting to correct his statement. I accept that he put his inquiry on the Order Paper in haste. I was very curious at the time, and had been waiting impatiently to hear what he had to say regarding this proposed merger. But, somehow I very much doubt that the announcement made by the Prime Minister creating a royal commission under Mr. Bryce had anything to do with this proposed merger, or any similar proposed merger. The commission will concern itself, as I understand it, with multinational corporations.

I think the best reason for giving leave to Senator Benidickson is his concern about his having prepared this inquiry in haste.

Senator Benidickson: I assure Senator Flynn that I know none of the principals of the two organizations that are referred to in the terms of the inquiry.

Senator Flynn: That is all right. I accept that, too.

Senator Benidickson: I have no such acquaintance. On the advice of some of my colleagues, given in the short time that was available, the inquiry was made broad enough to include any other public or corporate body that might have a massive influence on consumer pricing, and so on.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators, on behalf of the government, that the royal commission headed by Mr. Bryce will most certainly consider the concern expressed in Senator Benidickson's inquiry.

Senator Flynn: That is not what the terms of reference say. I do not know what you said to Senator Benidickson, but I know what was announced by the Prime Minister.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Benidickson leave to drop the inquiry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry dropped.

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

PARDON GRANTED TO DÉDÉ DESJARDINS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Molson on Tuesday, June 10, with respect to the construction industry in the Province of Quebec. It concerns the pardon granted to Dédé Desjardins.

I have been advised that under the Criminal Records Act information or facts relating to a pardon cannot, under any circumstances be divulged. This information can only be disclosed by the Solicitor General personally and then only in instances in which he feels it is in the interests of justice. So I am afraid that I am unable to provide any more information at this time.

Senator Flynn: We did not expect any more.

Senator Perrault: You can live in hopes.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Neiman moved third reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code:

[Senator Perrault.]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Norrie, that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Laird, in amendment, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following:

1.1. Section 32 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"32. This Act does not apply to any packaged food, drug (other than a drug or other substance defined as a controlled drug by Part III, as a restricted drug by Part IV or as cannabis by Part V), cosmetic or device, not manufactured for consumption in Canada and not sold for consumption in Canada, if the package is marked in distinct overprinting with the word "Export", and a certificate that the package and its contents do not contravene any known requirement of the law of the country to which it is or is about to be consigned, has been issued in respect thereof in prescribed form and manner."

Senator Walker: Explain.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Goldenberg: With leave, I would like to explain the amendment.

Senator Flynn: We would like that, also.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, this is a technical amendment, requested by the Department of National Health and Welfare. It is consequential on the addition of Part V to the Food and Drugs Act contained in clause 7 of Bill S-19. Section 32 of the Food of Drugs Act provides that, with certain exceptions, the act does not apply to drugs that are manufactured for export purposes. The intention of the amendment is to add cannabis to the exceptions, since under Part V, as added by Bill S-19, it is an offence to export cannabis.

● (2010)

Senator Flynn: Does that mean you will allow the export of marihuana?

Senator Goldenberg: No, this will include cannabis in the exceptions.

Senator Croll: Why not let it stand, and let us look at it?

Senator Goldenberg: Copies of the proposed amendment are being distributed. It is purely technical and consequential on the addition of the new Part V to the Food and Drugs Act.

Senator Flynn: It is too bad that Senator Prowse is not here to explain the amendment. He knows everything about this bill.

Senator Croll: It may be technical and very easy to explain, but I move the adjournment of the debate on the motion in amendment.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1975BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-3, intituled: "An Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975".
(Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.)

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, I had not expected third reading to take place this evening. I have a few remarks to make on third reading. Therefore, I would like this item to stand until tomorrow.

Order stands.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACTBILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill S-27, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate in order to find out what the bill was about. Even had I directed several minutes to this problem, I would have reached the same conclusion: that the bill is not simple, but insignificant. I cannot really understand why the government decided to present this bill to Parliament, because it does only two trivial things. First, it changes the name of the corporation and, secondly, it changes the title of the principal officer of that corporation.

The sponsor of the bill told us the government had several other amendments in mind but they were not yet ready. If they had something substantial to present to Parliament, I cannot see why they did not wait and make all the amendments at the same time. Instead they presented for our consideration a bill which changes the name of the corporation and the title of the principal officer.

What can I say but that this is trivia? If the government wants this bill to go through, well and good. But I doubt very much that it should occupy us for more than the few minutes we have already devoted to it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMYDEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to thank you for your kind cooperation tonight. As I stated last week, the state of the Canadian economy is now subject to very different and even conflicting interpretations. Some state that recession continues and that the unemployment rate will reach an average of 8 per cent in 1975. Others, on the other hand, say that a new growth thrust has begun and that inflation has become once more our main economic problem. Since on the whole these forecasts would require conflicting policies, one or the other will have to be chosen when the Minister of Finance delivers his budget speech on June 23.

The Senate does not have the opportunity to discuss the budget speech. Indeed, such a debate would be rather useless since it would take place only after the major orientations have been chosen. In my opinion, it is much more useful for honourable senators to have the opportunity to discuss decisions before they are made. They have the privilege to do so at least as much as private organizations such as the Chambers of Commerce and other similar organizations which, as usual, recently gave their opinions to the Minister of Finance on the course he should steer.

[English]

Honourable senators, this is my maiden speech on economics in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: It is about time.

Senator Lamontagne: I intend to devote the major part of it to an assessment of the current economic situation in an attempt to clear up the confusion now prevailing.

Senator Walker: Whereabouts?

Senator Lamontagne: I should like to begin by showing that while it is relatively easy to foresee the turning points in the economy with a satisfactory degree of accuracy, the conventional wisdom has been systematically wrong in its forecasts since the 1950s, the result of which being that government action has always been too late and has thus contributed to intensifying both cyclical inflation and unemployment rather than attenuating them.

The short business cycle—when I was a student it used to be called the inventory cycle—is one of the most regular economic phenomena. Its complete sequence, composed of its successive phases of recovery, boom and recession, has a normal duration of about 40 months. For instance, during the postwar period in Canada, recessions began at the end of 1953, the beginning of 1957, and 1960. We had a short pause early in 1963 and a more severe one in the last part of 1966. Other recessions began early in 1970 and in the second quarter of 1974. In the normal course of events, another recession should begin late in 1977 or early in 1978, unless the time bomb represented by the recycling of petrodollars explodes before and precipitates an international crisis.

● (2020)

These cyclical movements are obviously not always uniform. They may have different amplitudes and some are shorter than others but their regularity is nevertheless striking. Lord Keynes and his followers have recommended that governments should try to counter these cyclical downturns and upturns of the private sector of the economy by following an easy money policy and having systematic budgetary deficits during recessions and applying a tight money policy and having budgetary surpluses during boom periods. The aim thus appeared simple. Governments were to practise a countercyclical policy in order to stabilize the economy and fight successively cyclical inflation and unemployment.

However, this simple objective had two basic requirements. First, it implied that governments would be able to forecast in time the turning points of the economy; that is, the beginning of recessions and recoveries. It also required that governments and parliaments could act quickly with programs that could be rapidly launched and interrupted.

Unfortunately, both conditions were not fulfilled in the postwar period and we never had any proper countercyclical policy. What went wrong basically was the forecasting system used by the conventional wisdom. I intend to illustrate this point by reviewing briefly the Canadian postwar experience, although our country was certainly not the only one to fail. As I go along, I will refer also to my own assessments, particularly since 1957, by quoting briefly various documents, most of them unpublished, that I have prepared over the years. In other words, I intend tonight to unveil my own "hidden" reports. My intention in doing so is not to illustrate my ability as an amateur forecaster but rather to show that I do not speak from hindsight and that if I have been able over the years to forecast the turning points fairly accurately with my unsophisticated means, it should be much easier for senior government officials, with the vast means at their disposal, to improve the forecasting system which has been so ineffective in the last 20 years.

The first important postwar recession occurred at the end of 1953 and lasted for most of 1954. However, it was only on April 5, 1955, when it was over, that the Minister of Finance announced in his budget speech various measures to fight it. These measures, including tax cuts and a sizable deficit, began to have their main impact only in the latter part of 1955 and undoubtedly contributed to accentuate the inflationary boom of 1956.

Early in 1957, when I was economic advisor to the Privy Council, I became convinced that another downturn was imminent. One of my colleagues and I devised some proposals to stimulate the economy, including federal loans to municipalities and a special development fund for the Atlantic provinces. I remember that my honourable friend Senator Hicks was at that time premier of his own province, Nova Scotia. When we proposed this program to our colleagues in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada, we found that they did not accept our assessment of the economic situation but indeed anticipated a continuation of inflationary trends. They had prepared opposite plans to ours, designed to fight those trends. Each group stayed on its position and the only agreement possible was that neither one of the plans would be proposed to cabinet. The budget speech of March 14, 1957, provided for a sizable surplus and the Bank of Canada maintained its tight money policy. The economic decline continued and it was not before 1958, after the recession, that fiscal policy became expansionary.

At the beginning of 1960, when I was advisor to the Leader of the Official Opposition—and I am sure Senator Flynn and others will remember those years—I prepared notes which were used by Mr. Pearson in a speech he made in the other place on April 12 and which gave some indication that another recession was emerging. The Minister of Finance, after having provided for a very substantial deficit at the peak of the cycle in 1959, planned for a small surplus at the beginning of the recession in 1960. He accused the Opposition of being "lost in gloom of their own creation," and he stated:

I am confident, however, that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities, and as the economy continues its upward trend.

In other words, as Mr. Pearson said, unemployment would go with the snow. Precisely at the time when the Minister of Finance was making his optimistic forecast the downward movement had already started, as official figures showed later. In brief, for the then government that was the recession which never was.

On September 7, 1966, I made a speech at a caucus of my party in a further and last attempt to convince the Minister of Finance to stimulate the economy. After almost ten years I see no objection in quoting from my analysis. After having described the then prevailing economic situation, I concluded:

—the forces of expansion and contraction have reached a stage of delicate balance. On that basis, I am prepared to predict that if present policies are maintained during the coming months the forces of contraction will outweigh the forces of expansion and a general downward trend will develop.

On the next day the Minister of Finance said in the other place:

So we must turn to our fiscal policy to further assist in restricting the excessive global demand which is imposed on our economy during this boom period.

This was just the opposite of my diagnosis. The minister then announced a special austerity program but as I had predicted a significant economic pause developed. It was only in 1967 as a new upward movement or trend began that the minister abandoned his restrictive policies.

On March 24, 1970, in a speech delivered in Toronto, I said:

Whether or not North America is now experiencing the emergence of another recession is largely a question of semantics which is better left to practising politicians. It is more significant to say that the economy has been slowing down, and that this movement will continue at least until present government policies in the United States and Canada are reversed. Accordingly, I would not be surprised that the GNP in constant dollars will only increase in an insignificant manner during the first quarter of 1970.

● (2030)

In fact, it was to decrease slightly, as official figures indicated later on. Honourable senators will certainly remember that the government had announced another austerity program by the end of 1969, again on the eve of a period of decline.

On March 12, 1970, hardly two weeks before I made my statement in Toronto, the Minister of Finance, obviously not knowing that another recession had already begun, stated in his budget speech:

—we must be resolute in continuing to restrain the demands that are made upon the economy.

He announced his decision, which fortunately was not implemented, to regulate consumer credit in order, as he said, to cut consumer expenditures by $300 million or $400 million a year.

In a memorandum dated August 15, 1973, I wrote:

Thus, there seems to be solid and broadly based evidence that the American economy has reached a new stage in the business cycle and that it will follow a downward movement during the next months... The Canadian situation appears to follow closely the American pattern.

And I added:

In our country, as in the United States, public policy will give additional strength to basic downward forces rather than to countervail their impact.

This view, of course, at that time in August 1973, was not shared by most forecasters. However, the United States Department of Commerce announced recently that a new review of the evolution of the American economy showed that the recession had started in November, 1973. As far as Canada is concerned, GNP in constant dollars has not increased since the first quarter of 1974.

In January 1974, President Nixon stated before the American Congress that there would be no recession in the United States during that year. What is worse, President Ford repeated the same statement in September 1974. He said that inflation remained the major economic problem and, although the recession had already lasted for almost a year, he announced his intention to increase taxes. Besides, he was not the only one to express such views at that time. At one of the seminars organized then by President Ford, a well-known economist, Milton Freidman, among others, said:

We are not, and I emphasize not, in danger of a major depression or even of a severe recession.

Presumably some of these statements were based on the index of leading indicators then used by the commerce department which, it has now been discovered, misleadingly turned up for seven months in 1974 in spite of the rapid decline of the U.S. economy. In other words, the U.S. economic thermometer went in the wrong direction.

At about the same time, in another of my memoranda dated October 24, 1974—and this will be the last one that I will quote—I concluded:

In the normal course of event, the bottom of the recession should be reached during the first half of 1975.

So, at the very moment when I was forecasting the end of the recession, the conventional wisdom in the United States had not yet really recognized its beginning.

But suddenly in December, the American government began to show some signs of alarm. The President made a spectacular somersault, and advocated substantial tax cuts. Congress adopted its own, more expansionist version of that budget at the end of March 1975. That budget provided for an unprecedented minimum deficit of $70 billion, and its main measures have just begun to apply at a time when most forecasters at last recognize that the American economy is on the road to recovery.

Senator Asselin: How about the Canadian economy?

Senator Lamontagne: I will come back to that later.

I could give many signs to substantiate this assessment. I will mention only the views expressed just a few days ago by Alan Greenspan, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors, who said that June would be the first month of recovery, that the real GNP will rise more than 5 per cent in the third quarter and more than 7 per cent in the fourth. According to the method used in Canada to measure quarterly changes, this would represent an increase of 1.25 per cent and 1.75 per cent respectively.

A massive budgetary deficit will therefore coincide with the economic upturn and will once again overheat the U.S. economy. It is too much and too late. As a consequence, the American government will have to initiate an unprecedented borrowing program at the very moment when individuals and businesses will have a greater need for funds for housing and other new investments. To meet this joint increase in demand for funds a dangerous monetary expansion would be needed in 1976. It is highly unlikely that the authorities of the federal reserve system will allow such a development, and we may expect that in 1976 and 1977 tight money and rising interest rates and prices will reappear with a vengeance in the United States. For lack of a proper forecasting system and timely countercyclical policies, the American government will fight the 1974 recession during its 1976 fiscal year and thus sow the seeds of the next recession. One is tempted to say, "What a way to run a railroad!"

In Canada, the recession will have been shorter and much less acute than in the United States although it will probably have been the most severe since 1957. The private sector did not see it coming. As usual, during the last stage of the boom, production outpaced demand. The result was a rapid increase in inventories. The ratio of business inventories to shipments began to rise rapidly after February 1974. Such a substantial accumulation, mainly in the sector of durable goods, could not go on forever and production had to drop.

Moreover, government policies were not more appropriate in Canada than in the United States. Mainly for this reason, the housing market was overheated during the boom, and then overcooled as the recession developed. In centres of 10,000 people or more, housing starts, seasonally adjusted at annual rates, reached their peak in April 1974 at 242,000 units, but then dropped steadily to 99,000 in March 1975. Thus, last March, housing starts were only 40 per cent of what they had been a year before.

During that time, the interest rate set by the Bank of Canada was raised a percentage point to 8¼ per cent on April 15, 1974, just as the recession was beginning, to 8½ per cent on May 13 and to 9¼ per cent on July 24. It remained at that level until November 18 when it was reduced to 8¾ per cent. The rate was further reduced to 8¼ per cent on January 13, 1975. Thus, throughout the recession, the interest rate set by the Bank of Canada was higher than it had been during the boom in 1973 and early 1974. Some countercyclical monetary policy!

● (2040)

According to figures used by the Minister of Finance in his November budget speech, a substantial deficit of $673 million was recorded during fiscal year 1973-74 at the peak of the cycle, and a surplus of $250 million was forecast for fiscal year 1974-75 to coincide with the recession. These budgetary positions were just the opposite of what they should have been to counter the cycle. The Minister of Finance finally recognized the existence of a slowdown in his budget speech of November 18, and then proposed to stimulate the economy. But the minister stated in April 1975, in his economic review:

Since these measures were introduced late in the year, their full impact will be felt in 1975 and early 1976.

He could have been more precise and said that most of these measures were approved at the end of March 1975, so that they will begin to have their major impact only as the recession is ending.

Indeed, the most sensitive indicators show that the recession is now over in Canada. I am prepared to say that the index of real domestic product and the index of industrial production—two broad indicators—which both peaked in March 1974, reached their cyclical low in the first quarter of 1975. The index of production of durable goods, which is more sensitive to cyclical fluctuations, has risen for two consecutive months, February and March, on a seasonally adjusted basis. After a substantial drop in December and January, production of motor vehicles has experienced an almost similar spectacular rise in February and March. Wood industries are also very sensitive, reflecting fluctuations in housing. Their production peaked in April 1974, steadily dropped until January 1975 by more than 30 per cent, and rose successively in February and March.

The survey of capital spending conducted by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and published last week shows that planned outlays for 1975 in constant dollars will rise by 19 per cent compared with 1974.

Work stoppages, mainly in March, have resulted in disrupting our external trade. Our exports on a seasonally adjusted basis declined from $2.685 billion in February to $2.552 billion in March, but they rose again to $2.638 billion in April.

Another clear sign of the upturn is the substantial increase of almost 72 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis in housing starts in centres of 10,000 people and over between March and May. In April, seasonally adjusted Canadian sales of North American passenger cars increased by 10.5 per cent, as similar sales of all commercial vehicles rose by 15.2 per cent.

The gross national product, as we were told last week, in constant dollars declined by 1.4 per cent during the first quarter of 1975, but it would have increased by 0.6 per cent if inventory accumulation had not been reduced by $2.3 billion at an annual rate.

On the basis of this and other evidence I am prepared to forecast that the second quarter of 1975 will show the first quarterly increase in real GNP since the first quarter of 1974, especially if no account is taken of reduced investments in inventories. The recovery will be fairly rapid although, as the Minister of Finance said in Halifax on

[Senator Lamontagne.]

May 29, there may be no real growth for 1975 as a whole. But such a statement is rather meaningless and almost misleading. This comparison between 1975 and 1974 hides the true story which is that 1975, in terms of the cycle, will be just the reverse of 1974. When GNP figures for the first quarter of 1975 were published they showed a decline of 1.8 per cent over the annual level attained in 1974. Thus, in order to reach that level for the whole of 1975, an average quarterly increase of about 1.2 per cent would be needed during each of the last three quarters. Such a rise is likely, but it indicates a rapid recovery in the latter part of 1975 and an increase of approximately 4 per cent in the last quarter, compared with the first.

This rather substantial improvement does not mean that the current high rate of unemployment will decline for 1975 as a whole. But some forecasts claiming that the average annual rate will be 8 per cent are too pessimistic, in my view. In terms of the forecasting jargon, the GNP is a coinciding indicator and unemployment is a lagging indicator. When businesses decide to slow down production they first start by cutting overtime and reducing working hours before laying off workers. This means that unemployment begins to rise significantly only when recession has reached its acute stage. When recovery occurs and production is resumed, businesses first decide to extend the working hours of their employees before hiring new workers. This means not only that the main gains in productivity are made at the recovery stage of the cycle, but also that unemployment is likely to remain high during that period, especially if the labour force is expanding.

Thus, unemployment normally reaches its cyclical peak and stays at a high level after the end of a recession. It becomes a major political problem when the economy is already on an upward swing, when its causes have disappeared and it has ceased to be an economic problem. It is precisely at this juncture that governments are under political pressure to do something about unemployment, when most expansionist measures can do very little to resolve it but directly contribute to overheat the economy and to reinforce inflationary trends.

But even the employment and unemployment situation is looking brighter than most people expected. In May, on a seasonally adjusted basis, employment rose by 82,000, the biggest monthly increase since August 1974. In spite of a significant rise in the participation rate from 58.7 to 59 per cent, the rate of unemployment declined from 7.2 to 7.1 per cent, the first decline since October 1974. For the first five months of 1975 the average rate has been 7 per cent, and it may well have reached its peak.

● (2050)

With this background, the climate which constitutes the basic framework for the next budget can be summarized fairly simply. On the international front, it is now widely recognized that most industrialized nations are now experiencing an upward swing. Moreover, OECD countries agreed, quite unwisely in my view, at a meeting held on May 29, to further stimulate their respective economies. I have already mentioned in this respect the particular case of the United States, where an unprecedented budgetary deficit of at least $70 billion is planned for fiscal year 1976. This international climate means that Canadian exports will be strengthened in the immediate future, but that international inflationary trends, including rising interest rates, will have an inevitable and undesirable impact on Canada in 1976 and 1977. Those trends will probably serve as a basis to justify a further increase in the price of oil by OPEC countries later this year.

On the domestic front, gross national product in constant dollars will rise by more than 2 per cent during fiscal year 1975-1976 compared with 1974-1975. Most provinces are planning rather huge deficits for the current fiscal year. Ontario has already announced an unprecedented deficit estimated at about $1.5 billion, and Quebec has cut taxes by $540 million a year. Most of these measures will have their main impact in the latter part of 1975 and at the beginning of 1976.

Under such overall conditions, the Minister of Finance does not have much room to manoeuvre if he wants to be realistic. The only sound attitude at this juncture is to plan for the smallest possible deficit and borrowing program consistent with no overall significant changes in taxation. But to a large extent the minister is the prisoner of the immediate past. In his November budget speech he envisaged a budgetary deficit of $1 billion and total financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, of $3 billion for fiscal year 1975-1976. Under present circumstances this is too high.

I am sure that the minister can reduce these amounts by resisting further attempts to increase expenditures as revenues will rise more rapidly during 1975-1976 than he expected last November. He should certainly refuse the suggestion of Mr. Sinclair Stevens, who proposed recently to cut taxes by about $500 million. This would be completely irresponsible, in my view, at this stage. I believe also that a neutral monetary policy would be desirable at the present time, but I am afraid that the Bank of Canada could start again to restrict credit and to increase its interest rate in an effort to compensate for an excessively expansionary fiscal policy, if the minister cannot significantly reduce his projected budgetary deficit and borrowing requirements.

In other words, it may be too much to expect the Minister of Finance to produce a balanced budget, but he should try to move toward that position as much as he can, given the commitments that have already been made. Within limits, the government now has the opportunity to apply policies appropriate to the current phase of the business cycle. If it chooses to use this opportunity it will establish a sound precedent in our history, and it will be in a strong position to argue, when new international inflationary trends will develop in 1976, that it did its best, given the current circumstances, not to participate actively in this irresponsible movement. On the other hand, if it decides to further stimulate the economy at this stage, it will later on have to accept the blame for its inappropriate action.

Apart from this overall situation I would like to make three relatively brief comments on three special subjects, such as housing and the construction industry, our balance of payments and chronic cost-push inflation.

In my view, there is no current need, at least on economic grounds, to provide further stimulants to housing and the construction industry except to ensure an adequate flow of mortgage funds at about the current interest rates.

Investment plans for non-residential construction in 1975 indicate a satisfactory level of activity. Housing starts at annual rates reached in May the target of 210,000 units announced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and will exceed that target during the second part of 1975. Throughout the post-war period, housing and, to a lesser extent, perhaps, other sectors of the construction industry have been the main victims of untimely government policies. What they need now at last is a sound stabilization program to prevent exaggerated and avoidable ups and downs, which are major sources of inefficiencies and have a pervasive and unstable impact throughout the economy. The Economic Council of Canada published a report on this topic last year. I hope that the federal government and other interested parties will begin soon to implement the recommendations contained in that report and other measures designed to stabilize the mortgage market.

Our balance of payments is now the cause of some concern. The Minister of Finance recently forecast a current account deficit of about $5 billion in 1975, compared with $1.9 billion in 1974. He may well be too pessimistic. In any case, we should look at the two main accounts to see what can be done. There is not much we can do, in the immediate future at least, to reduce our chronic and mounting deficit in our service account. That leaves the trade account.

The minister has already expressed his worries, and rightly so, about irresponsible wage settlements and frequent interruptions in deliveries resulting from labour unrest. He has also criticized businessmen for not being sufficiently alert to new trade opportunities. I do not believe that these admonitions will improve our trade position in the immediate future. Moreover, I do not feel that we are about to price ourselves out of world markets. Much of the worsening in our trade balance which has occurred recently has been due to the fact that the recession has been shorter and milder in Canada than in most other countries.

However, there is one particularly important sector which should get the immediate attention of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Our trade deficit with the United States with respect to parts and accessories of motor vehicles has been rising steadily in recent years, reaching $2.2 billion in 1974, while our total external trade position showed in that year a surplus of about $1 billion. Again, part of this specific deficit was due to cyclical factors, more particularly to the fact that the recession was more severe in the United States than in Canada.

● (2100)

However, there may be more permanent changes at work as the American industry is getting prepared to concentrate more on the production of small cars. The government should follow this situation very closely and if it finds a new pattern emerging in the United States that could adversely and permanently affect Canadian terms of trade, it should initiate negotiations, under the auto pact, to change this pattern before it is too late. The government should not be too timid about this because the Americans were insisting on such renegotiations in their favour just a few years ago—I am sure honourable senators know about this—although at that time the Canadian trade surplus under the auto pact reached its peak at $224 million in 1971, which was negligible compared with our deficit of $1.3 billion in 1974.

Another item which may assume increasing importance in the next few years is our net imports of crude oil. We are facing a difficult choice in this respect: if we increase production to meet rising domestic demand and to sustain exports in order to avoid immediate balance-of-payments difficulties, we run the risk of experiencing much more serious problems in the future because our reserves will be depleted sooner. The estimates of our proven reserves have changed so drastically in the last few years that I do not know how the government can make a rational choice at this moment. Moreover, I feel that the situation which is likely to prevail in 1975 does not call for further drastic action in this area, since the government last week substantially increased export charges on refined products and raised by 100,000 barrels a day the export ceiling which will become effective on July 1.

I have limited my remarks to the cyclical situation. I hope to have shown the need for improving the government's forecasting system and for adopting timely policies which would greatly help reduce both cyclical inflation and unemployment. In this respect I want to emphasize that there is nothing wrong with restrictive policies per se. What is wrong is to apply them on the eve of or during a recession, which has been done too often in the past.

As distinct from cyclical and temporary difficulties, we are also facing structural or chronic problems, especially what I call cost-push inflation. We are at last beginning to realize that we cannot effectively fight this type of inflation, as distinct from demand-pull or cyclical inflation, by ordinary monetary and fiscal policies, unless we are prepared to create unbearable levels of unemployment and intolerable social injustice. Cost-push inflation is not a temporary problem that can be licked once and for all. Those who assert the contrary are the victims of a great illusion. Cost-push inflation has become almost a permanent feature of our affluent societies. It is caused mainly by the crisis of individual and collective rising expectations and by the spreading of monopolistic power, especially in the world of business and labour, which is used by those who have it to disrupt the market mechanism in their favour in an attempt to get for themselves a larger piece of the pie.

It is only when we identify the deeply rooted causes of this sickness, which I describe as collective irresponsibility, that we discover that certain apparently simple remedies will not work in the real world. For instance, how can we expect that a temporary freeze on prices and wages can be an effective cure when the trouble is chronic and almost inherent to the nature of man? How can we hope that voluntary restraints will provide the solution when the sickness is due basically to a deep lack of consensus, conflicting interests, and mutual distrust. In this context, the few groups which might be willing to exercise self-control would be the first victims of their dedication to the public interest. I do not need to show here that a general and permanent scheme of wage and price control is clearly unworkable in a democratic society like ours, relying mainly on private initiative. The sooner we will cease to centre our attention and debate on these apparently easy but unrealistic solutions, the greater will be our chance to design a more comprehensive and effective program comprising a mixture of complementary measures.

The first item of this new package would be, as I said before, the implementation of timely countercyclical policies so as to minimize cyclical inflation. Other proposals could be examined and refined such as the integration of the worker into the enterprise and his greater participation in its decision-making, as it is increasingly done in some of the most dynamic countries in Europe; selective but permanent wage and price arbitration in a few basic and monopolistic industries; the indexing of salaries in the public service to the general movement of wages and salaries in the private sector according to a more generous formula than the one which now applies to parliamentary indemnities; special tax provisions to nullify excessive gains in incomes, including profits.

A program of this kind would be more complex than the so-called simple solutions to which I referred just a moment ago. It would also be more realistic and have a better chance to work. Its implementation should, of course, be preceded and accompanied by a well organized information campaign in which all responsible opinion leaders should participate. Voluntary restraints alone will not work, in my view, but the development of a sound body of public opinion on the evil of chronic inflation is essential in a democracy to the success of any plan of attack.

Moreover, we cannot forget that chronic inflation is international in character, that it is a particularly acute problem for the industrialized world and that no single country can go it alone to fight it. I would suggest, therefore, that once the Canadian government has put together a coherent plan along the lines I have suggested, it should call for a special top level conference of OECD member countries to discuss this whole issue and to establish the basis for a broad intergovernmental consensus on a joint plan of action.

These are some of the views and proposals that I would like to see reflected in the budget speech. Between voluntary restraints and overall controls, both of which will not work in practice, there is, in my view, a third more pluralistic and more realistic alternative which we should try to find.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, if no one is prepared to speak on this subject between now and next week, I should like to adjourn the debate until the first sitting of next week.

● (2110)

Senator Flynn: May I ask a question of Senator Desruisseaux? Is he suggesting that he would like to speak to this inquiry after the Minister of Finance has presented his budget speech?

Is that his proposal?

Senator Desruisseaux: It is. Is there any objection to that?

Senator Flynn: It is a very simple procedure. You want to compare Senator Lamontagne's speech with the budget speech of the minister. There is no merit in that. If Senator Lamontagne was daring enough to suggest some measures to be included in the budget speech, I think you should be daring enough to do the same and not wait until after the Minister of Finance has presented his budget.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, my reason for asking to adjourn the debate until next week is that I am unable to be here tomorrow and Thursday. Also, next Tuesday is St. Jean Baptiste Day, and we have not yet been informed as to whether we will be sitting that day.

Senator Flynn: In any event, you would not be speaking to this matter until after Mr. Turner has presented his budget.

Senator Desruisseaux: I realize that.

Senator Flynn: Do you want to compare the two speeches, or do you want to offer some suggestions? That is my question.

Senator Desruisseaux: I have some views on the economic situation in this country, Senator Flynn, and I believe I am entitled to express those views even though the Minister of Finance may have brought down his budget before I have an opportunity to do so. I may not agree totally with what was said by Senator Lamontagne tonight.

Senator Flynn: But it will be too late. If you have some views on this, I think it is very urgent that you let the Senate know those views right away. I am anxious to know what you have in mind.

Senator Desruisseaux: I could speak tonight.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Desruisseaux: Because it will take an hour.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to remain here for another hour. I am quite sure that all honourable senators would be willing to stay and listen to you.

Senator Desruisseaux: If any honourable senator wishes to adjourn the debate, let him do so.

Senator Flynn: I will certainly move the adjournment of the debate to enable Senator Desruisseaux to speak tomorrow or Thursday.

Senator Langlois: What about speaking yourself?

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

BROADCASTING

APPEARANCE OF GERDA MUNSINGER ON CBC TELEVISION PROGRAM—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

That he will inquire of the Government:—

1. How much did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pay Mrs. Gerda Munsinger for her appearance on the Barbara Frum Program on CBC TV at 9.00 o'clock Saturday evening, June 7, 1975,

(a) by way of expenses,

(b) by way of fees?

2. Has Mrs. Munsinger a record of criminal convictions in Canada?

3. How long is she to be allowed to remain in Canada?

4. Is it the intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to present other persons of similar qualifications on this program at public expense?

5. If so, what is the budget for such appearances?

6. What criteria does the corporation use in selecting the people who are to appear on this program?

7. Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program is a proper use of public money?

8. Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program conforms with the CBC's mandate as laid down in the Broadcasting Act?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I am waiting, first of all, for word from the government. I cannot add anything to my inquiry, or discuss it in any way, until I have received some information from the government, if it has any information to give. If it has no information to give, then, of course, I may proceed with some further discussion of the matter.

I don't know what I am expected to do now. Perhaps I should just say "stand"—

An hon. Senator: Stand.

Senator Forsey: —with hope springing eternal in this particular human breast.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

ALLIANCE SECURITY AND INVESTIGATION, LTD.—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-26, respecting Alliance Security & Investigation, Ltd., and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED—THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion, in amendment, of Senator Goldenberg to the motion of Senator Neiman for the third reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, when I heard the amendment presented yesterday it appeared to be quite long and a little difficult to understand when hearing it for the first time. And I must have failed the course in speed reading, because when a copy was delivered to my desk I just could not grasp it that quickly before concurrence was moved. However that may be, the moment I heard the mover say that it was a technical and consequential amendment I waited for him to say that it was just a simple amendment and my ears perked up immediately. I knew that I had to pay some attention. As a matter of fact, I did not know where the amendment came from. It came at the very last minute, more than six months after the bill was introduced. It seemed to me that if the Department of National Health and Welfare was paying some attention to this bill and its consequences, its officials would have known a long, long time ago.

In any event, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee sat yesterday morning to study Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act. Eight members were in attendance, and if the amendment we are now discussing was available yesterday morning it should have been presented to the committee for consideration and acceptance. If it was not available until the afternoon, copies should have been sent to the committee members who were in the city. This was not done. It would have been easy enough to deliver a copy with a note stating that the amendment would be presented for consideration last night. It would also have been possible to speak with some of the members. Some members appeared to know the contents of the amendment, but I was not one of those.

In case of emergency, I have no complaint. The authority of the chairman comes from the committee and he must always turn to the committee for that authority. It does not come from on high. In any event, I have read the amendment carefully. It is a very useful and needed amendment, and I support its adoption.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, just by way of explanation, the amendment was sent to me yesterday afternoon.

Senator Grosart: From on high.

Senator Goldenberg: I did not have it yesterday when our meeting was in progress. It did come from on high. I managed to send a copy to Senator Flynn, as a matter of courtesy. I wanted to make sure there was a French translation, and at the same time I tried to get a copy to Senator Asselin. Also, I did not ask the Senate to approve it last night, after moving the amendment.

• (1410)

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, by way of further explanation, as the seconder of the amendment I knew about it some 30 or 60 seconds before it was made.

Senator Goldenberg: A minute and a half.

Senator Laird: A minute and a half, the chairman said.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand from Senator Goldenberg's comments that this amendment was not worth being referred to committee?

Senator Goldenberg: I did not think it had to be referred. As Senator Croll said, it is a simple amendment.

Senator Flynn: That is what worries me.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, just one word on the subject. The Leader of the Opposition and I have discussed the amendment proposed on third reading.

As stated by Senators Goldenberg and Croll: "It is a very simple amendment". However, once again, during the drafting of the text, the illogicality of the Department of Justice was evident, especially when it was stated that the definition of trafficking in cannabis had been transferred to the Food and Drugs Act for purposes of logic and continuity.

The amendment simply states that since it is by virtue of the Food and Drugs Act, the cannabis bill must be united with the Food and Drugs Act. But the reason why I find things illogical is that when the definition of cannabis trafficking was studied, no one wanted to put it under the Food and Drugs Act. With regard to such trafficking, the definition that was kept was the one contained in the Narcotic Control Act.

I still believe that such a provision is illogical. However, we are willing to accept the amendment. Furthermore, I wish to state that by not taking the definition of cannabis trafficking as contained in the Food and Drugs Act and by keeping the same definition as the one in the Narcotic Control Act, the Department demonstrated a lack of logic.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Norrie, that the bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laird, that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended by adding thereto—

Senator Langlois: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, shall the main motion, as amended, carry?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think a few words have to be said on third reading of this bill. It was introduced several months ago, and was studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs with the help of many expert witnesses.

The bill came back to us, and it appears that no one is entirely satisfied with it. Those who think that the use of marihuana or cannabis represents a real danger for society are certainly not happy with this bill. That is the conclusion I have reached from hearing the many speeches made in this place—from hearing Senator Denis, Senator Heath and others on this subject.

Those who expected that something would be done to diminish the seriousness of the offence of using marihuana, or other offences related therewith, are also unhappy with the bill.

As far as I am concerned, I took it for granted that since the government had introduced this bill, it was in favour of some liberalization. If it were not, it had only to leave the legislation as it stands today and consider marihuana as dangerous as other drugs coming under the Narcotic Control Act. Since it decided that it should amend the present legislation and transfer offences involving marihuana or cannabis to the Food and Drugs Act, it must have meant that it considered that the penalties under the Narcotic Control Act were too severe for marihuana-related offences.

If you accept that the legislation should be amended, it is because you accept that such offences are not as serious as they have been considered to be up to this time. I accept that. And the government obviously accepted that, else they would not have brought forward the legislation.

Unless, of course, the government was only trying to placate a sector of public opinion by giving the appearance of doing something, in which case the bill before us today is probably a masterful answer.

This bill, as honourable senators are aware, would transfer cannabis from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act, the Food and Drugs Act being more of an administrative act and the offences under it less criminal in nature than the Narcotic Control Act.

After much study in this area, the committee accepted the bill presented by the government, with some minor amendments, such as reducing the sentence for simple possession and increasing it, in theory only, for trafficking. The committee's proposal is that the penalty in respect of trafficking be increased from 10 years to 14 years less a day. As was mentioned by several senators, recent decisions indicate that the penalties imposed are very rarely more than 10 years. So the decision of the committee in this respect is simply an attempt to calm public opinion as to the consequences of this legislation.

Some honourable senators—Senator Bonnell being one—are very much afraid of the interpretation which the public may put on what the Senate has done and is about to do with regard to this bill. I do not think the Senate should be blamed. I think the government should be blamed. If the offence is as serious as Senator Bonnell and those who share his views would have us believe, then this bill should never have come to us. Since it has come to us, I have to assume—and I do not think the work of the committee has rendered this assumption unjustified—that offences connected with the use of cannabis should not be in the same class as other offences under the Narcotic Control Act. If I don't assume that, I will have to vote against this bill, as Senator Denis has indicated he will do, because he does not like this legislation at all. He feels that the government should not promote liberalization in the area of so-called soft drugs.

What is truly annoying, however, is the awkward situation which the committee and the government is placing us in as a result of the suggested amendments. It is indulging in half-hearted measures, trying to retain most of what is in the Narcotic Control Act while, at the same time, trying to give the impression that it is doing something very important by transferring these offences from one act to the other. Its lack of conviction was proven by the refusal to accept the amendment moved by Senator Asselin. The offence of trafficking under the Food and Drugs Act does not include the word "give," whereas it does under the Narcotic Control Act. If it was the wish of the government to move substantially from one act to the other, the definition of trafficking contained in the Food and Drugs Act should have been made part of this bill. The definition of trafficking contained in the Narcotic Control Act, which does include the word "give," should not have been imported.

● (1420)

On that basis I think the legislation is entirely unsatisfactory. I do not know what the decision of the Senate will be on third reading, but one way or the other I am quite sure that it does not achieve very much. It may perhaps achieve what Senator Bonnell was afraid of, namely, giving the impression that we are liberalizing the use of cannabis. If that was the intention, we should have been more frank and straightforward about it. Do we want to or do we not want to liberalize in this area? If we do, let us pass legislation that follows logically upon that intention. If we do not, let us vote against it.

I accept that the government did not present this legislation without having studied the substance of the problem. I assume that the witnesses who appeared before the committee gave evidence that the use of cannabis was not as serious a problem as the use of other narcotics.

In view of all this, I shall vote for the bill, but with reluctance and with no feeling whatever of satisfaction.

Senator Heath: Honourable senators, I hope we will not proceed with the bill at this time. I further hope that this house will recommend to the government that it come forward with something more progressive to look after the innocent members of the public who need protection from the menace of drug traffickers. I also hope that there will be some widening of the penal provisions of the legislation so that we do not take away from the courts their present power to give life sentences, as we are doing by this bill.

I could not help wondering when Senator Lamontagne, in his excellent speech on the economy last night, referred to the countercyclical problem, whether that is what we are running into over this problem with cannabis. Four years ago this bill would perhaps have been apropos. However, this is not the situation now. We presently have a multi-drug problem. Cannabis and the other drugs are inextricably bound together. When we put forward the right legislation at the wrong time we are doing a great deal of harm, and I suggest that is what we are doing now.

I hope that we will not proceed with this bill at the present time and, if I have a seconder, I would move that we not proceed with the bill.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean we should vote against the bill? That is a negative motion.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, if I speak at this time, will my speech have the effect of closing the debate?

Some hon. Senators: No.

Senator Neiman: I feel I must say a few words on the comments that have been made today by Senator Flynn and Senator Heath. We really must understand and appreciate the amount of work and thoughtful labour that has gone into the consideration of Bill S-19. As Senator Laird said last week, the committee held a total of 30 meetings on this bill, of which 21 were in public and 9 in camera. The in camera meetings were held to consider special problems the committee felt might arise respecting particular provisions of this bill.

Honourable senators, I think I can do no better than quote a passage from Dr. Harold Kalant's presentation to the committee. I think everyone would agree that Dr. Kalant is a highly respected scientist. When he spoke to the committee some time ago he made a point which we must all keep in mind. He said:

The decision which Parliament must ultimately make on Bill S-19, as on any other drug control measure, is essentially a cost-benefit analysis which involves four elements: the benefits derived from cannabis use, the cost—medical, social and otherwise—of the use of the drug, in this case cannabis; the benefits derived from legal controls of cannabis use; and the costs—social, economic and other—of applying those controls.

These are the very problems to which the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has devoted its attention over the past several months. We have heard experts from every field—from the sociological fields, the scientific field, the medical field, the law enforcement field, defence counsel, the crown attorneys and representatives of government. All of these witnesses were deeply concerned with not only the health questions but also the penal questions, and consequential questions, respecting the use of this drug.

Honourable senators, I do not want to be considered as speaking for my fellow members of the committee, but I do believe there was one thing we really began to appreciate before the hearings were over. We all understood that as far as the health hazards are concerned we are only at the beginning of knowledge of this drug, cannabis, which can be characterized in many ways. We had fascinating evidence presented to us by scientists. Dr. Dana Farnsworth, a Harvard psychiatrist and chairman of the National Commission of Marihuana and Drug Abuse, appointed by the President of the United States and the Congress in 1971, called this drug "the deceptive weed." He had this to say about it:

It has a nature so diverse as to make almost any statement about it a target for contradiction. Estimates of its effects are notoriously unreliable. Its ambiguous nature appears to invite strong opinions that attempt to evoke certainty where none exists. Policy makers tend to become victims of their own propaganda. When marihuana first started to become a social problem in this country, members of Congress were led to make definitive judgments quite unsupported by reliable evidence. Laws were passed, based on definitions known to be unscientific. Criticisms that now appear valid and scientific were rejected out of hand.

I offer as an example of the statement he made the fact that marihuana, or cannabis, was placed under the Narcotic Control Act. Despite the remarks made by Senator Flynn today, there is a perfectly logical and sensible reason for simply moving it from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act, and that is not to say that the government thinks it is any less dangerous than many of the drugs in the Food and Drugs Act today.

Senator Flynn: No, that has not been the attitude of the minister.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I may phrase it another way. The Food and Drugs Act is only concerned with the administrative control of therapeutic drugs. There are drugs under the Food and Drugs Act which we consider much more dangerous—I believe that opinion would be generally accepted in the scientific community—than cannabis is. The committee was simply trying to deal with the state of affairs as it is. We recognize that we do not really have any concept of the potential health hazards of cannabis, but they undoubtedly are there and every member of the committee appreciated that fact just as I am sure all honourable senators do. The committee, as a body or individually, is not encouraging the greater use of marihuana products. That is why it simply concentrated on the legal aspects of the problem involved in this bill. In fact, the amendments to Bill S-19 which have been placed before the house are not radical. There is nothing in those amendments, or in the bill itself, which would radically change the administration of the law or the general public's view of what the government thinks are the potential dangers and hazards of this substance.

● (1430)

The statement has been made that we are moving towards a somewhat softened attitude with respect to marihuana. As Senator Goldenberg pointed out, in the first amendment of substance—that with regard to the offence of possession—we are not changing much in the law as it is presently administered. There are already conditional discharges; there are already absolute discharges. The judiciary is free to make use of those provisions in our law. The only change we have recommended there is the automatic expunging of the criminal record in cases in which the judge gives either an absolute discharge or a conditional discharge. The fact is that if the judge feels he wants to give an absolute discharge, he may, but he does not have to; if he feels he wants to give a conditional discharge, he may, but he does not have to. It is only when he does either of those that there would be an automatic expunging of the criminal record.

I stress again that the judge, in deciding upon the penalty for the offence of simple possession, will still be quite free to impose a fine. If he does so, the present law still holds. The person who is charged and convicted can still apply for a pardon under the presently existing law. In effect, therefore, all we are attempting to do is simply deal with the backlog of cases in which people have been convicted of relatively minor offences, thus enabling them to obtain a discharge without going through a long, tedious process.

As Senator Goldenberg said, if this amendment is accepted here and in the other place then undoubtedly the Department of Justice will consider applying it to other cases, rather than restricting its application to offences under the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. Let me stress once more that we have not done anything radical or extraordinary with the proposed legislation. We have recommended changes. I would remind Senator Bonnell that the fact the legislation was introduced in this house and then referred to committee does not mean that the committee should automatically report it without amendment. Furthermore, the fact that I sponsored this legislation does not mean I have to turn off my mind when I go into committee, and be unwilling to consider the possibility that some area might be improved. I am not suggesting that my ideas are always the best. Some of the suggestions and recommendations I put forward were not adopted by other members of the committee, and I accept that. We did not all agree.

Honourable senators, I say again that there is no suggestion that this legislation is perfect. Of course it is not perfect. This is a very difficult subject. The whole problem of cannabis use and abuse will occupy the minds of the public and the government for a long time to come. I think, however, that the committee has dealt with this bill as fairly and as responsibly as it could. I commend the bill, as amended, to your favourable consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I now have a motion in writing.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Heath, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, that the motion for the third reading of the Bill S-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, the Narcotic Control Act and the Criminal Code", be amended by striking out the word "now" and by adding the words "this day six months", at the end of the question.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the motion in amendment will please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are against the motion in amendment will please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator McElman: On a point of order, how does this motion get before the house?

Senator Argue: Let us have the vote, and get it over with.

Senator McElman: That is all very well, but there are those in the house who have great respect for the rules. I am not saying that I am one who goes very far with regard to this, but I do ask how this motion got before the house. I think this question is deserving of an answer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I received the motion in writing after Senator Neiman's speech.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps I can help Senator McElman. What Senator Heath had in mind was exactly this motion, but she did not express it before resuming her seat. If Senator McElman is not satisfied with the procedure, someone else may rise and make the motion and it will come to the same result. So, I think he might as well withdraw his objection.

Senator McElman: I am not making an objection. I simply asked how this motion got before the house.

Senator Flynn: That is what I was trying to explain to you.

Senator McElman: I am grateful for your explanation. There was no explanation before, and I think we should know what is going on in this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Senator Flynn: Agreed!

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the main motion carry?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak any further on this motion, but this afternoon I have been quite shocked and amazed. I was shocked and amazed, after hearing how some honourable senators worked so hard and so long to bring forward a report with recommendations for changes—which, in my opinion, are right—only to discover that all those hours of hard work—

● (1450)

Senator Choquette: And money.

Senator Bonnell: —were expended just to make sure that the bill was legal and constitutional; that there was nothing wrong with it legally. I thought the committee would have looked into the social problems of this drug. I thought, because expert witnesses gave evidence, that they would certainly have looked into the medical problems of this drug.

Senator Asselin: We did so.

Senator Bonnell: I thought they would certainly have checked into the welfare problems of this drug, and into the economic problems, but I find out this afternoon from the sponsor that the committee spent all this time looking into the legal problems of the drug.

Senator Goldenberg: Has the honourable senator seen the names of the witnesses and read the evidence heard by the committee?

Senator Bonnell: I have read some of the evidence, and was impressed by it and some of the questions asked. I was impressed by the witnesses and the committee. I was very impressed by the report, until I came to the conclusion, upon hearing the sponsor say that the committee was only discussing the legal aspects of the bill, that all my impressions were in vain.

In my opinion, this is too big a problem, too serious a problem, to have so much time spent in considering it from only one point of view. If that is the case, then we should not have third reading today, but should consider the major problems that this drug is causing in this and other countries. I would like to see the Senate sit in Committee of the Whole and call witnesses to tell us about the health problems—how the drug destroys the brain, affects the second generation children, and causes impotency and infertility in males; how it is stored in the fat cells of the brain for as many as two or three weeks; how it does so much damage, not only to long-term but short-term users; how it affects the alertness and brightness of youth; and how it affects even older persons. If all that time was spent by this important Senate committee and those important witnesses in considering the legal aspects, and forgetting the people and the social problems, then in my view the committee was remiss in its duties.

I do not wish to waste the time of the Senate if this has been done; if these aspects and other problems in addition to the legal and constitutional questions were considered by the committee. In that event, I would be prepared for the bill to receive third reading now. However, if those aspects have not been considered, and were not in the backs of the minds of the members of the committee, I think this debate should be adjourned.

Senator Choquette: We have already voted on it.

Senator Bonnell: We have voted on what? We voted that it not be given the six months' hoist, but I hope we have not voted yet on third reading, because I am on my feet right now to discuss whether we should vote yea or nay.

An hon. Senator: You are too late.

Senator Bonnell: I am not too late. Third reading has not taken place.

Senator Asselin: But to postpone it for six months.

Senator Bonnell: I voted against that. I did not want it put off for six months.

Senator Flynn: Only six days.

Senator Bonnell: I voted against the bill's being read the third time six months from now, but I am ready to vote for third reading soon.

However, I want to be sure that we have not considered this bill from just one angle. That is what worries me. I think the legislation is good, and that the committee heard expert witnesses. As I said before, I was very pleased with the report of the committee, but when the sponsor said that legality was the problem to be considered, and not the others, I became afraid of what we might be doing if we did not consider them. I think we did consider them, and that most members of that committee had those matters in the backs of their minds.

I do not wish to prolong the debate, but also I do not wish to leave the impression that I voted for the bill only on its legal and constitutional aspects. I want to vote for this bill because it was looked into and researched by the committee. Before the vote is taken I would like a member of the committee to assure me that all aspects of this measure were thoroughly considered.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I think, in fairness to the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman, I should say a few words in reply to Senator Bonnell.

● (1500)

I asked Senator Bonnell, during his remarks, whether he had read the proceedings of the committee, and he said he had read some of them. If he would read the proceedings thoroughly he would see that the committee received evidence from expert witnesses, not on legal matters alone but on medical, psychological and sociological aspects of the use of cannabis. We heard quite a number of opponents of the legislation on medical grounds. They were given a full hearing. We had medical and scientific experts from across Canada, and from the United States. We heard both sides—those who hold the view of Senator Heath and Senator Phillips, and those who share the view of Senator Asselin.

I assure honourable senators that the committee looked into all aspects and arrived at its conclusions on the basis of an examination of all aspects of the problem.

Naturally, it all ends up in a law, and therefore there are legal considerations. We had to give a great deal of thought to what the committee wanted to do. The committee wanted to save youngsters—I am repeating what I said in introducing the report of the committee—from having a criminal record for a first offence of possession in case of discharge; and there we had to do a lot of inquiring into the law.

I merely repeat that the committee considered every aspect mentioned by Senator Bonnell in the course of his remarks.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I want to supplement, for the benefit of Senator Bonnell—who I understand would like to be convinced that he should vote for this particular measure—

Senator Flynn: He is not the only one.

Senator Buckwold: I want again to put on record the fact that the President of the Canadian Medical Association—an organization of which I am sure the honourable senator is a distinguished member—was one of the first witnesses. I refer to Dr. Bette Stephenson.

The honourable senator raised the question of the medical aspects of the problem. I wish to re-emphasize that among the very first witnesses was the representative of the medical profession of this country who, in completely and absolutely unequivocal terms, gave an endorsement of the bill now before us. As a matter of fact, I think she would have encouraged the committee to go further. She presented evidence of studies done by the Canadian Medical Association to the effect that they could find nothing that would inhibit the passage of the legislation now before us, including all the committee's recommendations.

I want to get this on the record again so that when this appears in the press, if it ever does, the Canadian public will be made aware that the committee did not deal just with the so-called legal problems—something which I am sure the mover of the motion merely drew to the attention of honourable senators as one aspect that faces a committee when dealing with the law.

The fact is that I, as one who was not that easy to convince on this particular bill, was completely satisfied, mostly as a result of the evidence of the Canadian Medical Association.

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks.

The honourable sponsor of this bill moved second reading on December 5 last year, and I spoke immediately following her introduction. I remind Senator Bonnell that 90 per cent of my presentation concerned medical aspects. All of what Senator Buckwold has just said was in my speech, as were the final remarks of Senator Neiman concerning Professor Kalant.

As I saw the committee progress, I could see that I was again in the jungle of lawyers. Although I did take an interest when it was physically possible for me to do so, I was a little upset in one respect. We heard from experts, and we did not have to go to foreign fields to find them. The most outstanding man on the continent in this particular field is probably Professor Harold Kalant of the Department of Pharmacology and head of the Alcohol and Addiction Research Foundation in Toronto. He made a masterful presentation.

The reason I voted against the bill is because—here I agree with Senator Bonnell—I felt that more of the medical problem should have been considered.

Of three points that I made in my speech on December 5, the third—and I think it could have been taken into consideration—was this:

Since the knowledge of the long-term effects of cannabis use will obviously increase with time, and the balance of relative costs arising from law enforcement and from heavy drug use will become easier to assess, would it be worth while to make any changes in the law initially on a trial basis, as was done for repeal of capital punishment?

I might say I am in favour of capital punishment.

If this were obligatorily linked to a monitoring of the costs of the law, the extent of cannabis use, and a follow-up of the effects on known users, the definitive legislative decision at the end of the trial period would be assured of a sounder basis.

And medical science would be in a better position to give a definitive answer in the near future.

At this very moment another investigation is being carried out in the Medical Sciences Building of the University of Toronto, under the jurisdiction of Dr. Kalant and myself, of the effects of cannabis on the hearing mechanism and balance mechanism of heavy users.

Therefore, I feel a little bit chagrined that the speech I made, which contained all the leading authorities that one could really find, plus a masterful presentation from Dr. Kalant, was a little bit overlooked.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, may I say that I have here a complete list of all the witnesses who appeared before the committee. If honourable senators wish it tabled, I shall be glad to do so.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the main motion carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN ACTS IN RESPECT OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Laird moved the third reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Judges Act and certain other Acts for related purposes and in respect of the reconstitution of the Supreme Courts of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Laird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, that the bill be now read a third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, let me reassure you at once that I am not speaking on third reading to oppose this bill, or to move an amendment. However, there are a few things which I think need to be said at this time.

Respect for law is a principal cornerstone of a free society. It is a subjective concept that must stem from the people. Another word for it is "law-abidingness." It is sometimes referred to as the rule of law, rather than of men. In any event, without it, however it is described, our society will soon disintegrate, leading to anarchy, leaving in its wake some form of facism or communism.

● (1510)

I need not remind honourable senators that in recent years there has been a serious erosion in respect for the law throughout this country. There has been a plethora of illegal strikes, but disrespect for the law is by no means limited to the workers of this country; it exists in high places, as you know. I need only cite "Harbourgate" and capital punishment as examples. The law requires capital punishment for the murderers of policemen and prison guards. Yet, the government in every case, under the umbrella of executive clemency has, in effect, nullified the law.

It is our duty as lawmakers to enact wise laws that will command the respect of the people, and it is the duty of the judges to administer the law without fear or favour. The judges are doing their duty. We have as fine a corps of judges as has any country, and that is why I support this bill. However, are we as legislators doing an equally good job? If we examine our consciences we will find, I think, that we have important work to do to stop this erosion of law-abidingness, which continues to threaten the very foundations of this country.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to add a footnote, not to what Senator Choquette has said but to the committee hearing of yesterday. The committee hearing dealt mainly with the situation of the widows of judges who died several years ago. It was decided that there was nothing the committee could do. However, I think that the evidence the committee heard should suggest to the government that it would be wise to take a second look at the problem in an endeavour to correct a situation that needs correcting. There are many cases which are deserving of more sympathetic consideration. Even after the improvements contained in this bill go into effect, some of these widows will still be faced with having to live on ridiculously low pensions.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I wish to correct an impression that I may have given. I am in favour of the bill and the increase in salaries for judges of not only the Supreme Court of Canada and the superior courts of the provinces but also the county courts. Every part of this bill has my support and agreement.

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-27, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1975BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill C-3, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1975.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SALARIES ACTBILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Salaries Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-24, if passed, will amend section 3 of the Salaries Act, which is chapter S-2, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

As honourable senators are aware, the British North America Act of 1867 makes provision for the office of lieutenant governor in each of the provinces, and section 60 of that act provides that the salaries of lieutenant governors shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

This bill, if passed, will fix the salaries of lieutenant governors in all the provinces uniformly at the level of $35,000 a year.

I might add at this point that the income tax applicable to a taxable income of $35,000 is in excess of $10,000, and the salaries that are being provided at this new level for the lieutenant governors are, of course, taxable.

Perhaps honourable senators might be interested in knowing the recent history of the salary levels for lieutenant governors in all the provinces. In 1952, the salaries were as follows: for Ontario and Quebec, $10,000; for Prince Edward Island, $8,000; for all of the other provinces, $9,000. Those levels were changed in 1963 and, in fact, doubled. For Ontario and Quebec the salary was increased to $20,000; for Prince Edward Island, to $16,000; and for all the other provinces, to $18,000. There have been no salary changes since 1963.

I felt I should get as much additional information as I could for the benefit of honourable senators. In addition to the salaries provided for lieutenant governors, I am told that there have been federally provided allowances since 1952. These are non-accountable allowances and are made to lieutenant governors for hospitality and other expenses within the capital where each is seated. In 1974-75 these non-accountable allowances were $18,000 for the three provinces of British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec; $15,000 for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; $12,000 for New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland; and $10,000 for Prince Edward Island. In addition to these non-accountable allowances an annual fund of $100,000 was provided by the federal government in 1973, on a trial basis, to cover expenses incurred by lieutenant governors outside of the provincial capitals. I am informed that resort to this fund has been relatively light, and that in no one year has it exceeded more than $15,000 or $20,000.

In addition to these federal salaries and allowances, there are benefits provided by provinces. A residence is provided in a good many provinces. In fact, all provinces but Ontario and Saskatchewan provide a residence for the lieutenant governor. I am informed that Government House in Alberta is available to the lieutenant governor as a residence, but it seems to be part of the provincial museum and is not used very extensively by the lieutenant governor. I am also informed that there are very good facilities provided by some of the provincial governments in the way of a residence, staff, furniture and the other requirements of a government house in the provinces of Quebec, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, although a little less in the other provinces.

Senator Croll: Is there a pension?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): At the moment there is no pension for the lieutenant governors, but Bill C-23 will shortly reach us, which will make provision for pensions for the lieutenant governors on a contributory basis.

It may be of value, honourable senators, if I were to list at this point in my remarks the names of each of the lieutenant governors, the province for which he serves and the date of his appointment.

Senator Croll: He or she.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I am sorry—he or she. It is useful information to have on record, and might be particularly useful when the pension bill reaches us. The list is as follows:

| PROVINCE | NAME | DATE APPOINTED |
|----------------------|-----------------------|-------------------|
| Quebec | Hugues Lapointe | 22 Feb. 1966 |
| Saskatchewan | Dr. Stephen Worobetz | 22 Dec. 1969 |
| Manitoba | William John McKeag | 3 July 1970 |
| New Brunswick | Hédard J. Robichaud | 7 Oct. 1971 |
| British Columbia | W. S. Owen | 13 Feb. 1973 |
| Nova Scotia | Dr. Clarence L. Gosse | 10 Sept. 1973 |
| Ontario | Mrs. Pauline McGibbon | 17 Jan. 1974 |
| Newfoundland | Gordon A. Winter | 21 Mar. 1974 |
| Alberta | Ralph Steinhauer | 30 Apr. 1974 |
| Prince Edward Island | Gordon L. Bennett | 22 Oct. 1974 |

Senator Choquette: What is the term of office? Is it indefinite?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): The term of office is normally five years, but it is during pleasure. It is normally five years, but nothing is required to extend it; it is done on an informal basis.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMYDEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Lamontagne, calling the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak very long. I feel, after what I did to Senator Desruisseaux last night, that I have a duty to participate. I want to say at the outset that we should be thankful for a rather profound and well-documented speech by Senator Lamontagne.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: He said it was his maiden speech on the subject of economics, and I commented, "It is about time," because he has been here several years now. I hope he will in future favour us more often with speeches of this kind.

I am not too sure that the timing of Senator Lamontagne's speech was good. That, of course, is not entirely his fault. He intended to address us on this subject anyway last week. But the course of our deliberations did not permit him to go ahead. Certainly, making that speech only six days before Mr. Turner presents his budget speech does not allow much time for us to debate the question in a way that can be useful to Mr. Turner. I am quite sure, however, that some of Mr. Turner's advisers will at least bring Senator Lamontagne's speech to the minister's attention.

I have only a few remarks to make about what I could describe as Senator Lamontagne's recipe for avoiding future inflations followed by recessions. As he sees it, we are in this mess because governments have never learned to react properly to the economic indicators. They have been expansionist when they should have been restrictionist, and vice versa. In addition, they have been gloriously inept in their timing.

It does not seem to have occurred to Senator Lamontagne that we might be better off if governments, especially the present government, would only learn to keep their hands off the economy, to interfere less instead of more. He recommended at the end of his speech that the government implement timely countercyclical policies to minimize cyclical inflation. Why did he not recommend that they simply interfere less? Why did he not recommend something new, refreshing and avant-garde; for instance, a freer market economy? We live in a mixed and government-controlled economy; government controls have become more and more oppressive over the years, and the results have been depressing.

We are in a recession now, and have been for several months. Inflation is destroying us, and all Senator Lamontagne can suggest is more government intervention. Instead of spending his time on the differences between cost-push and demand-pull inflation, Senator Lamontagne would have been well advised to devote more time to the root causes of inflation. The statist philosophy will never die as long as Senator Lamontagne is around. To him econometrics is the answer. Give the economic hotshots in the Finance Department a whole lot of figures they can graph and all the authority they need to control our economic lives as they see fit, and there won't be a problem.

Not once did Senator Lamontagne suggest that the government cut back on its spending. He recommended the status quo for now in spending. That is not good enough. The government, if we are ever to restore health to the economy, will have to cut its spending drastically. That is not what Senator Lamontagne said, but it is what the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance said when it studied the estimates for the current fiscal year. I suggest to you that that is what Senator Lamontagne should have been saying last night.

Senator Lamontagne belittled the idea of tax cuts. More statism. Never limit the income of the government; give them more money to waste. Well, I am convinced that taxes must be cut. The private sector and individual wage earners must be permitted to keep and administer more of what they have earned, more of what is rightfully theirs.

Honourable senators, it will be very interesting to compare Senator Lamontagne's views with those of the Minister of Finance next Monday night. The task with which the Minister of Finance is confronted is not an easy one.

● (1530)

I am not convinced that Senator Lamontagne is right when he says we are out of the recession. Nor am I convinced he is right when he says tax cuts are not the answer, that we must maintain the status quo in taxation of personal and corporate income. There are many authorities other than Senator Lamontagne who are not convinced that the indicators point to an exit from this recession. The number and reputation of those authorities lead me to doubt that the position taken by Senator Lamontagne is the proper one. He may consider himself a better judge than I. Given his background, he may be a better judge. But I am satisfied that I am in good company. It will be interesting to see if this time the government or the Minister of Finance agree with Senator Lamontagne. He told us last night that in the past he has been a better judge than the government and the various ministers of finance. He may have been better at spotting upturns and downturns, but this layman humbly suggests there is more to economics than that.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I want to intervene in this debate for the purpose of saying two things. One is that I think the speech we heard last night from Senator Lamontagne was one of the finest, one of the most penetrating, one of the most valuable I have heard since I came into this chamber. I hope that ears in the other place, in high places, will be open to what he said.

Secondly, I want to say, merely by way of what some senators may think irrelevant reminiscence, that I recalled last night to Senator Lamontagne that when the late Mr. Pearson was forming his first government I had the temerity to suggest to him that he should make Senator Lamontagne finance minister. After listening to that speech last night I regretted very much that my rash and impertinent advice to the Prime Minister of that day had not been taken.

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1976—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I beg leave to yield to Senator Perrault.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, it is distressing to note the voice of pessimism we heard the other day in this chamber, the voice of the Honourable Senator Grosart; and again today that same sombre, dark, foreboding note of pessimism expressed by the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: The sober, second look.

Senator Perrault: There are people in our society who would say, when there is only 50 per cent water in a glass, that the glass is half empty, and there are other people who say that that glass is 50 per cent full.

Senator Flynn: And there are some people who change their views according to whether they are on this side or the other.

Senator Perrault: There is a basic philosophical difference in attitude.

In resuming the debate on Senator Sparrow's motion of last Wednesday, Senator Grosart outlined with considerable force—

Senator Flynn: And skill.

Senator Perrault:—and power—I shall not use the word "skill"—the need for budgetary restraint by all levels of government. His leader echoed the same thing a few moments ago, in speaking to the admirable speech delivered by Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Flynn: I was only endorsing the committee's report.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators on the other side who take this position that many Canadians of all parties share the view that there should be restraint shown by governments at this particular time in the economic development of this nation.

Senator Flynn: Good.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator the other day opened by raising the possibility that the 1975-76 estimates, considered by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, may be substantially altered by the new budget to be tabled by the Minister of Finance in a few days' time. The estimates, as well as the 16 per cent target for containment of increases established by the President of the Treasury Board, were established on a set of economic assumptions which the Minister of Finance may well alter in the light of the latest information. Surely we would not wish any minister of finance, either at the federal level of government or at the provincial level, to be so inflexible as to be unwilling or unable to adapt to the economic circumstances which may present themselves from time to time.

Senator Flynn: Great.

Senator Perrault: Inflexibility would be the height of folly.

Then we were told the other day by Senator Grosart that—and I think these were his words—there is not the slightest chance that the President of the Treasury Board will be able to meet his commitment to keep 1975-76 total expenditures within 16 per cent of those of the previous year. I want to remind honourable senators that the commitment was made and reinforced several times by the President of the Treasury Board, and he is determined to meet that goal within the existing fiscal framework.

If the budget speech again changes some of the assumptions upon which this target was set, any restraint program, if indeed restraint is to continue to be a feature of government efforts at the federal level, will only deviate to the extent imposed by any new assumptions.

Let us get back to this demand labelled "restraint." It is one which, as Senator Grosart pointed out, is more easily made in its generality than in any specific programs of government. How many times have we heard from political platforms the cry for restraint—the demand that we must cut back on government spending. I remember one dialogue in which I was involved some months ago. I put the question, "You say we must engage in restraint, you say there must be massive cut-backs—where would you start?" And the reply was, "That is not our job, that is government's job."

Again the other day we heard the word "restraint" expressed in a general way by Senator Grosart, but there was a significant lack of specifics on where we would start. It is often stated that we should start with certain services. It is all very well to talk about a cutback in Information Canada or the Local Initiatives Program, but these are extremely small items in relation to the total amount of dollar spending by any level of government.

Senator Grosart: What about the $2 billion in unemployment insurance?

Senator Perrault: I am coming to that. But surely the honourable senator is not suggesting that those people who have paid their unemployment insurance premiums and find themselves unemployed at this particular time are not entitled to have that problem of unemployment covered by the unemployment insurance program?

The honourable senator specifically warned us at the start of his remarks—and I want to be exact in my quotation of him—that he would not, as he phrased it, be put "on the spot" at this time to reveal what cuts he would be prepared to recommend. I think all of us in government want to encourage the honourable senator, with all of the sincerity we can muster, to put himself "on the spot" and reveal to us where these major cuts are going to be made. I want to assure him at the same time that the government is ever mindful of the need for restraint.

In justice to him, I think it has to be admitted that he relented somewhat as he warmed to his subject, and that he did give us some broad classes of subjects where in his view questionable expenditures are likely to be found. His remarks were especially interesting in that, while he kept close counsel and did not say specifically where to cut, he had some quite clear and specific advice as to a few areas where no cuts were necessary.

He was willing to suggest, for instance—and this was a candid and admirable characteristic of that speech—that oil subsidy payments were tantamount to bookkeeping entries because the money went directly into the consumer's pocket. Certainly nobody in Canada is going to resent the fact that substantial amounts of money are finding their way to the hard pressed consumer. But surely the senator was a little less forthcoming when he failed to let that same spirit of understanding temper his wrath, chagrin and dismay at the extent of the supplementary estimates in 1974-75. When he came to that point in his speech he did not seem to consider that the $1.3 billion in the supplementary estimates for oil subsidies was a matter to be disregarded in his process of condemning the totals involved. What, at one point in that speech, was a back-handed compliment to the government for putting so much money into the pockets of the consumers of Canada became, just a few moments later, part and parcel of a general condemnation of the government for extravagance.

One of the main reasons and purposes of the supplementary estimates was, of course, the fact that this $1.3 billion was rather unprecedented, and was unforeseen to a large extent, for reasons known to all senators.

The senator's generous vein was pursued in discounting transfer payments to the provinces, since again those are instances where the federal government collects money not for its own purposes but for expenditure by others. I think those who support the government are dismayed from time to time to note how little credit is given to the federal government for having to pluck all of these taxation feathers—and in the process Ottawa gets all of the hissing with none of the benefits.

The senator applied the same standard to family allowances. That was a generous thing for him to do. He was only slightly more reticent when it came to such programs as old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and unemployment insurance. I realize that in his heart the senator supports unemployment insurance. Together with all of us, he wants to see it administered as efficiently as possible. That is what we in government support. I can only presume since programs like unemployment insurance and the others, however, also involve the collection of money for redistribution to individuals, that they do not qualify for that list of items which are "ripe for cutting back" by the honourable senator.

If I may question Senator Grosart on any point, I want to say that I do so with a great deal of hesitation because of his great candour in volunteering advice the other day. The reason for questioning, however, is that he left the impression that the sums of which he spoke were negligible by comparison with direct federal expenditures where he alleged—I think these were his words—"great extravagance."

He spoke of something in excess of $2 billion for transfers to provinces. I am sure he meant to say $6 billion because that is more closely the figure, but he said well over $2 billion. I would say that $6 billion transferred to the provinces is "well over" $2 billion! He did not attempt to quote a figure for transfer payments to individuals, which is certainly a significant part of government activity, but let us put it on record this afternoon. The figure in question—that is, transfer payments to individuals—is in the neighbourhood of $9 billion. So we have transfers to provinces of $6 billion, not $2 billion; and transfers to individuals of $9 billion, for a total of $15 billion transferred by the federal government. That is $15 billion—not $2 billion.

These facts must be placed on the record, because there have been some unfair attacks on the Minister of Finance and the government in respect of matters of this kind.

If the senator's test is to separate transfers to other governments and individuals, as being acceptable and unavoidable, from other types of federal expenditures, then I simply repeat that the total for the two types of transfers was $15 billion in 1974-75 on a main estimates base of $22.022 billion. For that year they represent precisely two-thirds of the total. Given the fact that $2 of every $3 collected was slated for expenditure by someone other than the federal government itself, it is perhaps less surprising that substantial supplementaries were needed in 1974-75 to cope with inflation, not only in some of the direct programs but primarily in escalated transfer requirements such as that oil compensation figure we spoke about a few minutes ago of $1.3 billion, provincial revenue guarantees and transfers of $786 million, hospital insurance and medicare of $442 million, and so on.

However, Senator Grosart did single out the whole area of the purchase of goods and services which accounts for most of the government's direct operations, as honourable senators are aware. He alleged that this is the sphere in which, with the federal government in the lead, an increasing percentage of the gross national product is being consumed by all governments. He then went on to cite and endorse a recommendation by the Canadian Economic Policy Committee with which I find myself in total agreement. The reference appears in the record of his remarks at page 1056 of Hansard of last Wednesday:

Specifically, the target should be that total spending on goods and services by governments at all levels should not be allowed to expand at a rate more rapid than the overall growth potential of the economy.

That is a statement of the Canadian Economic Policy Committee with which the honourable senator agrees, and I too find myself in agreement with it. That recommendation is good. More pertinently, it is one to which the federal government subscribes and in which it has set an example. That is not known to enough people in this country and certainly is a fact not recognized by many members of the media and those who are active in public life.

Far from wishing to put Senator Grosart—and since he used the expression "on the spot," I will do the same—on the spot, I have reviewed his comments in a true liberal spirit of seeking to pursue the principles he set forth in making judgment on the validity of specific government expenditures. If, as he suggests, the fiscal culprit in our national economy is an expansion in the purchase of goods and services, then the argument should be clearly demonstrable from national accounts. It should be right there.

There does not appear to be a shadow of a doubt from Senator Grosart's statements that he would expect the results of such an analysis to show that the federal government is taking money out of the economy for goods and services at a faster rate than the economy is growing. The analysis is a simple one. The figures are on record for anyone who wants to spend a brief few moments in fundamental analysis to see. And I am surprised that the honourable senator did not test his allegations against those facts.

Honourable senators, this statement can be made without refutation: over the last 20 years the federal government has not been spending on goods and services at a faster rate than the growth of the economy. It has been spending, in fact, at a considerably lower rate. In 1954 the percentage of gross national product applied by the federal government to goods and services was 8.9 per cent. Since 1954 the percentage of GNP applied by the federal government to goods and services has gradually decreased from 8.9 per cent in 1954 to 5.2 per cent in 1974.

That is hardly the action of a profligate and wasteful government. Yet, in blaming all governments for excessive increases in this sector, Senator Grosart singled out the federal government as the worst offender.

Senator Grosart: I did not.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps he may wish to make an analysis of the record of the Government of Ontario, which has been that of a well known party for a considerable number of years. He may find out what has happened with regard to the percentage of the GNP applied by that government to goods and services between 1954 and 1974.

• (1550)

Senator Grosart: I am confident that the honourable leader does not wish to misrepresent me. I am quite sure I never singled out the federal government. I was very careful, in every reference, to speak of "total government expenditures," which is the accepted term for all three levels of government. I am quite specific in saying that I have never, as far as I know, suggested that the rate of increase by the federal government was greater than that of other governments, because I know the contrary to be true.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate Senator Grosart's clarification on that point, and if I was under an incorrect impression I am pleased to have his explanation. However, as it turns out, according to the honourable senator's own yardstick, the federal government is not really the offender. This may not be a charge which he has levelled, but I feel it is important to get these facts on the public record. I think that whoever makes that kind of charge directs it at the wrong level of government. It is the wrong target that is aimed at when attempting to establish federal responsibility for an inordinate increase in the percentage of the gross national product invested in goods and services.

The same national accounts make clear at what levels of government, and to what extent, the purchase of goods and services has been a dramatically increasing factor. In 1954 the provinces consumed 2 per cent of the gross national product for these purposes, and the municipalities 3.8 per cent. By 1974 the provinces had increased their 2 per cent portion to 5.2 per cent of the gross national product, while the municipalities had reached 6.4 per cent of the gross national product for purchases of goods and services. In short, the federal government has not only met the guidelines recommended by the Canadian Economic Policy Committee, but has, in fact, bettered them by one-third. During the same period the provinces have increased their share of the gross national product by 150 per cent, and the municipalities by about 90 per cent, but I simply leave it to honourable senators to judge which level of government gets the blame in the editorials attacking the governments for alleged "profligate spending," "wasteful spending" and "overspending."

Of the $27 billion spent by all governments on goods and services in 1974 the federal government spent only $7 billion. Yet this is the sector of federal spending which some choose to criticize as a central cause of inflation. As much as I concur in the need for restraint—and I assure honourable senators that this is a sentiment shared by my colleagues in government—I fear that the formula advanced by Senator Grosart the other day leaves very little scope for meaningful budgetary reductions. He has, in effect, taken the $15 billion in transfer payments, which is collected by the federal government and spent by others, and applied norms to the assessment of expenditures on goods and services which show these to be moderate to the point of being positively exemplary. I think all of us in this chamber are very much interested in fair play.

Senator Grosart: I would like to make a correction. I am not speaking twice in the debate, but merely suggesting that my remarks may have been misconstrued.

The honourable the Leader of the Government made a good deal of the difference between my figure of $2.6 billion, as the budgetary fiscal transfer to the provinces, and the figure of $6 billion which he quoted. I would merely remind him that the figure I quoted is the official figure for fiscal transfers—that is, transfer payments to the provinces—as shown in table 1 of the government's own publication How Your Tax Dollar is Spent, 1975-76, issued by the Department of Finance.

Just for his information, in case he is not aware of it, the figure he quoted is not a budgetary figure.

Senator Perrault: I think the statement of Senator Grosart is certainly correct, to the effect that there was a $2.5 billion fiscal transfer to the provinces; but that is only part of the picture. In fact, the total payments to the provinces exceeded $7 billion.

Senator Grosart: I was speaking of budgetary figures, and the honourable Leader of the Government is apparently not yet aware of the difference between budgetary and non-budgetary figures.

Senator Perrault: I am deeply aware of the difference.

Senator Grosart: What is the difference?

Senator Perrault: In establishing guilt or innocence in this matter of contributing to inflation through government spending, this additional amount of $4 billion cannot be ignored, whatever category you place it in.

Senator Grosart: I have no objection to that statement. I am merely rising to correct the correction the Leader of the Government made, when he said that my figure was wrong. I am saying to him that my figure is correct, according to the authority I have just quoted.

Senator Perrault: As far as it went.

Senator Grosart: But how much farther do I go?

Senator Perrault: At least as far as $7 billion.

Senator Grosart: Can I go beyond the official statement by the Minister of Finance?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the Senate, I remind you that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is scheduled to meet in room 256-S when the house rises. This meeting will be delayed for some 15 minutes owing to the fact that a party caucus is scheduled for the same time. I am sure the delay will be for no more than 15 minutes.

Senator Asselin: Which is more important—caucus or committee?

Senator Bourget: Both are important.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 19, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would like to welcome in your name a group of distinguished parliamentarians of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association branches in the African region who are completing in Ottawa a tour of Canada. I wish to express my best wishes to every one of them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF
HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Monday, June 23, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

Senator Asselin: I hope that Senator Lamontagne will have a very privileged place in the House of Commons on this special occasion.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, presented the report of the committee as follows:

Thursday, June 19, 1975

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to which was referred Bill C-19, intituled "An Act to provide for payments in respect of wheat produced and sold in Canada for human consumption in Canada" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, May 21, 1975, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

However, your committee is concerned that the real value of the floor price established on September 11, 1973, when the two-price wheat policy was implemented, has been diminished by the considerable increases in the costs of producing wheat and that it is no longer a fair and reasonable price for wheat produced and sold in Canada for human consumption in Canada.

Your committee therefore recommends that, immediately upon the coming into force of the Act, the Minister undertake a review of the two-price wheat policy in accordance with subsection 5(3) of the Act. Subsection 5(3) reads as follows:

"5(3) The Minister shall, on an annual basis and in consultation with the producers, review the provisions of this Act and all related regulations enacted by the Governor in Council with a view to making such recommendations to the Governor in Council as are appropriate in the light of prevailing costs of production of wheat and returns to producers."

Respectfully submitted.

Hazen Argue,
Chairman.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I believe this bill was introduced by Senator Molgat, but with leave of the Senate I would move third reading at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, before giving leave I think we should have an explanation. It is true that our rules make it possible to adopt the report of a committee which does not propose amendments to a bill. In fact it is automatically adopted. Our rule says that third reading shall be moved for a future date. It is not my intention at the moment to hold it up if it is the desire, as I gather it is, to obtain royal assent today. Before the request for third reading now is carried further, I would ask that an explanation be given of the recommendation.

Senator Flynn: Why did you stop half way without an amendment?

Senator Argue: Am I being asked why we should have third reading now?

Senator Grosart: No, just to explain the recommendation before you ask for leave.

Senator Langlois: Just explain the recommendation.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, Bill C-19 provides in clause 5(3) that on an annual basis the minister will review the two-price wheat policy, and he may, if he thinks it desirable, make recommendations that there be an upward revision in the $3.25. In fact, I believe that this policy has been in operation since September 1973. Since then there has been a further substantial increase in the costs of production. It was the opinion of the representatives of the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board, when they appeared before our committee, that if this bill passes it will result in an immediate review, and they were under the impression that this would very quickly result in an increase in the price of wheat. Some members of the committee felt that the word "annual" might be construed to mean one year from now, so we are recommending merely that the first annual review be made now and not a year from now, because of the increase in costs.

Senator Flynn: Could it not have been done by an amendment, if you wanted to be sure? I do not know why the chairman of the committee hesitated this time. Usually he brings in amendments.

Senator Lamontagne: It is more effective to make a recommendation.

Senator Argue: I do not bring in amendments unless the committee passes them. I bring in amendments on behalf of the committee; I do so if I am asked to. However, we will see what happens with this recommendation.

Senator Perrault: This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition is showing an uncommon interest in wheat problems. I hope that from now on he will regularly attend meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture so that he will be able to move his own amendments.

Senator Flynn: I would not mind, but Senator Argue takes up so much space in the committee that there would be no room for me.

Senator Argue: On the contrary; we would be delighted to see the Leader of the Opposition attending committee meetings, as well as the Leader of the Government, because they are both ex officio members. I might point out that at the last number of meetings we have had two active and competent members of that committee from the official Opposition, so perhaps the Leader of the Opposition is represented there in another way.

● (1420)

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might say a word with respect to the possibility of amending Bill C-19. The committee did give consideration to recommending an amendment, but a problem arose in setting up a formula whereby one could change the $3.25 floor price on an annual basis. The problem is that the only statistics really available are statistics kept by Statistics Canada, and they are at least a year old by the time they are made available to us. With inflation running at the rate it is today, I do not think those statistics are adequate to cover the increased cost. For instance, using Statistics Canada figures, we get something like a 14½ per cent increase for the year 1974. In my view, that is certainly not adequate to compensate farmers for the increased cost of production.

There may be a time when statistics will be available, but at the moment those statistics are not adequate, and using them would not really compensate the farmer for his true increased cost of production. Personally, I believe it would be better to leave this annual review to the minister in consultation with the producers so that they can use other material that may be available from other sources, and arrive at a more accurate percentage of increased costs. It would be very difficult to frame an amendment using the formula that would reflect these costs up to date.

Senator Flynn: Are you suggesting that with the present wording the minister would have the discretion to make this annual review at any time, or more than once a year?

Senator McDonald: No, I am not. Clause 5(3) of the bill makes provision for an annual review.

Senator Flynn: But, at any time?

Senator McDonald: What we were concerned about is that while we think an annual review is satisfactory, as the bill stands this first review could be now or twelve months hence. The reason for the recommendation of the committee is that we think—and the producers are asking this—that the review be made now.

Senator Flynn: So the next one would be at this time next year?

Senator Argue: That would be all right.

Senator McDonald: That would cover the two boards. The Canadian Wheat Board is responsible for the Western Canada production, and the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board is responsible for this area. The crop year for Central Canada production ends on June 30, and for Western Canada production on July 31. Therefore, this is a logical time of the year to make that review because the course can then be set right for the next year.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I believe we are actually debating a motion to suspend our rules. May I be permitted to say I was very interested in the observation made by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, who was almost suggesting a new rule. He is quite often impatient with the strictures of the rules. He suggested that the chairman of a committee should not move an amendment unless that amendment has been discussed by the committee. In view of what happened the other day—

Senator Argue: Recommended by the committee.

Senator Grosart: Very well—unless recommended by the committee. I trust the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will take note.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Flynn: Leave is granted.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, June 25, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Perhaps I should give a word of explanation concerning the adjournment and, at the same time, outline the projected workload for next week.

In moving the adjournment until two o'clock next Wednesday afternoon, I have taken into consideration the fact that the House of Commons does not sit on June 24, St. Jean Baptiste Day, and that for some years now it has been the practice of the Senate not to sit on that day either. We have, however, already received Bill C-62, the Old Age Security Act; the main supply bill will pass through the Commons tonight, and I have been informed that we will also be receiving Bill C-50, the Agriculture Stabilization Act. It would seem necessary, therefore, for the Senate to sit at least in the afternoon on Wednesday. There will be a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration on Tuesday next at 3.30 in the afternoon. The following day, Wednesday, that committee will leave for meetings in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and Halifax, Nova Scotia. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service has also scheduled a meeting for Tuesday at 8 p.m.

On Wednesday at 3.30 p.m. the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet to hear witnesses with respect to its study of Canada's relations with the United States. Also on Wednesday, when the Senate rises, the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will sit to consider possible amendments to the rules of this house. There will also be other committee meetings as the legislative program requires.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has scheduled a meeting for 9.30 a.m. Thursday to hear witnesses on the advanced study of the Bankruptcy Act, and at the same time on Thursday there will be another meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the deputy leader if I understood correctly what he said, namely, that the Senate will be sitting on Wednesday afternoon and that three committees also plan to sit while the Senate is sitting. No leave has been asked for those three committees to sit while the Senate is sitting. If, as I believe you stated, yet another committee sits immediately when the Senate rises, that will mean, as I understand it, that four committees will be sitting on the same afternoon at approximately the same time. Am I correct in that understanding of what the deputy leader has just said?

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Langlois: No. There will be one committee sitting at 3 p.m., another at 3.30 p.m., which in all likelihood will be after the Senate has risen, and then the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will be sitting when the Senate rises. That is only three committees on that afternoon.

Senator Forsey: I am sorry to have to correct that statement, honourable senators, because, although word may not have yet been passed on to the leader's office, nevertheless, the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will also be meeting on Wednesday afternoon at 3.30. I am sorry that you have not received that information yet.

Senator Langlois: My information comes from the Committees Branch only, senator. I have no other sources.

Senator Grosart: In that case, honourable senators, I must point out that that means there will be five committees meeting on the one afternoon.

Senator Langlois: No, only four.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the deputy leader will correct me. I understand that the following committees will meet: Immigration and Citizenship; Employer-Employee Relations; Foreign Affairs; Standing Rules and Orders, and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. That is five. Am I correct?

Senator Langlois: Actually, the Committee on Employer-Employee Relations is planning to sit at 8 p.m., not in the afternoon.

Senator Grosart: Then, four committees are sitting Wednesday afternoon. So, we now have an announcement that they will be sitting, and yet so far as I know no leave of the Senate has been requested for any of those committees to sit during the sitting of the Senate on Wednesday afternoon. Is that not correct?

Senator Buckwold: If I may be permitted to intervene, honourable senators, I should like to make one correction with respect to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. That meeting was scheduled for Tuesday evening at 8 p.m., but in view of the holiday, and in view of the fact that this is also a joint committee, it was considered appropriate to cancel it. That is said just for the record.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, some time ago I said that I would not give leave for any committee to sit when the Senate is sitting. I relaxed that viewpoint for a while, assuming the point I had made might have got through. Instead of that, we have had a proliferation, greater, I think, than at any time since I have been in this chamber, of committees seeking to meet while the Senate is sitting. I suggest very strongly to those who have the management of the Senate that in these cases they inform committee chairmen that the rule must be adhered to. They are perfectly entitled to schedule their meetings when the Senate rises. We should not be told, as we have been told today, that committees that have not asked leave of the Senate will be sitting at the times mentioned.

I may feel constrained in the future to refuse leave, as I said I would, unless there is a satisfactory explanation on an emergency. I point out again to those who have the management of the Senate that this creates an absolutely intolerable situation for those of us on this side who are trying to do our duty in manning these committees. We do not like to see a committee sitting without a representative of this group. We feel it is in the interests of the Senate that there be a representative of the official Opposition in attendance at every committee meeting. What we have heard announced today makes this virtually impossible. I ask those who have the management of the Senate to take this into consideration.

I can see no reason, unless there is an emergency—and there are emergencies sometimes—for this situation to arise, but it has now become a custom to announce to the Senate that it is the intention of committees to sit while the Senate is sitting. We have now got to the point where the announcements are made officially, without leave even being asked.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I might point out that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has a standing motion to enable it to sit while the Senate is sitting, so I do not think we are guilty in this particular instance.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to remind Senator Grosart that some time ago a coordinating committee was formed to arrange the sittings of committees. To my knowledge, this committee has been functioning. I do not know if communications have broken down—this is beyond my knowledge—but it is a fact that there is such a coordinating committee, which is composed of members from both sides of this house. I do not know who is the representative of the Opposition side, but I am sure there is one on this committee.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps we should call it the uncoordinating committee, since the Deputy Leader of the Government now tells us that he has not heard from the committee. Furthermore, he seems to assume that the leader and the deputy leader have no responsibility in this matter because there is a committee considering it, and has been considering it for four months.

Senator Perrault: I am sure this problem is known to most of the members of the Senate. A number of useful, thoughtful and productive meetings have been held in an attempt to find solutions, and I think the honourable senator is aware of the hope that in the next few weeks we shall solve these problems. There remain one or two basic conflicts between committees that traditionally have arranged their meetings at the same time, and so on, but we have made good progress, and I assure honourable senators that this is a very important consideration from the point of view of the government side of this house.

Motion agreed to.

SALARIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Salaries Act.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, the bill now before the Senate is not a particularly complicated or contentious one. I congratulate Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) on his introduction of this measure on second reading. While I do not think it is necessary to refer it to committee, I should like to say a few words about it.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I think that this bill concerning an increase in salary for lieutenant governors should have been submitted to the Senate long ago.

Before speaking of this proposed increase for lieutenant governors, I should like to reflect briefly on the institution of the office of lieutenant governors. What I am about to say does not involve the official Opposition; I simply wish to make personal comments.

I feel that for the past few years, the office of lieutenant governor has not been enjoying the prestige and lustre of former times. That is obvious in Quebec. And I also think that we have proof of that in the other provinces, when young Canadians speak to us about constitutional institutions of this nature. I know that in Quebec, when we attend student seminars, they speak to us about constitutional reform and Canada's political independence.

[English]

Senator Benidickson: Would Senator Asselin permit me to say just a word?

Yesterday I found the amplification not adequate for the English interpretation of the speech of a French-speaking senator, and the same is true today. This was also the case last Tuesday evening when Senator Lamontagne was speaking.

I have complained with respect to this to the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I wonder if there are means of increasing the amplification so that I may hear Senator Asselin's speech?

Senator Asselin: I have myself mentioned this difficulty to Her Honour the Speaker.

Senator McIlraith: The amplification is good now.

Senator Asselin: So I will resume speaking in French.

[Translation]

As I was saying, when one attends seminars for students, those of the young generation who come after us, and we are asked questions about the political independence of Canada, there is often talk about that institution of lieutenant governors and the Governor General. I think that issue is currently being raised not only by young Quebec French Canadians, but also young English Canadians in other provinces. Indeed, in several provinces, especially Quebec, I have the impression that in recent years, the prestige, the lustre attached to the position of lieutenant governor, has been reduced—not that there was an attempt to downgrade the institutional responsibilities, but the lieutenant governor is not considered, as in the past, a very important figure.

I remember when I was a young man and the lieutenant governor came to either visit schools or attend an official ceremony, I think people went all out. It was the great authority coming before the students. Today, that is no longer the case, not only in Quebec, but it is no longer the case either in the other English provinces. During my trips in Canada I met young English Canadians who asked themselves the same questions as young French Canadians at home.

I am not suggesting that the function of lieutenant governor should be abolished but I suggest that when the federal government and the provinces decide to draft a new constitutional formula, they will also have to think about finding a new formula for those institutions that seem obsolete and outmoded to the young at home.

Of course, it is often said that the lieutenant governor represents the Governor General and, consequently, the British Crown; it is then difficult to explain to the young that our country is independent and tell them at the same time why we have a representative of the British Crown at the federal level and that there is also a representative of the same authority in the provinces.

The same thing could perhaps be said about the Senate. Should the Senate be reformed? Of course, eventually, we shall have to try to find a new orientation for the Senate. I hope that the responsibility for taking the initiative to find the formulas required to renew our senatorial system will belong to all honourable senators who sit in this house.

This was also considered when we sat on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada. Several young members of the other House expressed the view that, as regards the political opinion of Canada, some other formula should perhaps be implemented to replace the positions of lieutenant governor and Governor General.

I would now like to talk about the salaries. I have the impression that the government has been somewhat parsimonious. When the Superior Court judges are given $53,000, if the lieutenant governors receive only $35,000, with the excessive increase in the cost of living, I believe that they are not treated fairly.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) said yesterday that the expenses were paid by the provinces. But, even at that, I have the impression that in the future only rich people with personal assets will be able to accept the position of lieutenant governor. It is not with $35,000 that someone who does not have any personal assets will be able to accept the duties and responsibilities of a lieutenant governor.

I would have preferred that the government treat them at least as well as the judges of the Quebec Superior Court and the other provincial superior courts. I thought that the government was perhaps restricted in its action by a statutory act setting the salary of the Governor General at $48,500 a year. Of course, it would be unthinkable that the lieutenant governors be paid as well or better than the Governor General of Canada. However, if this institution is to survive, I believe that the government should review its position and give to lieutenant governors a salary which would allow them to live decently. I know lieutenant governors of certain provinces who find it very difficult to balance their budgets.

These people assume responsibilities as Canadians. I feel the government failed considerably when it granted them a salary of only $35,000 a year, the more so considering that they will have to pay $10,000 in income tax, which means that they are getting a net salary of only $25,000 a year. Moreover, we know that they must entertain very often and lavishly—without any help from the provinces—which they must often pay for out of their own pockets. I feel we are imposing undue hardship on lieutenant governors by granting them a salary of only $35,000 a year.

[English]

When Senator Connolly said that there is actually no pension plan for the lieutenant governors, I was very surprised. He said that legislation will be introduced in the House of Commons to provide a pension plan for lieutenant governors. I would like to know if he can answer these questions: What kind of plan will it be? Will it be a plan to which the lieutenant governors will contribute, or will the contributions be made by the government alone? What will be the situation of the lieutenant governors if they have no such plan and do not make contributions to a federal plan?

[Senator Asselin.]

● (1450)

The government should state what will be the financial situation of lieutenant governors when they retire. This question has to be answered. Perhaps Senator Connolly could provide the answer before third reading. This is not a contentious bill, and we on this side of the house are not in favour of referring it to committee for further study. We are satisfied with the explanation given yesterday by Senator Connolly, but before we pass the bill on second reading I ask him to provide further information regarding the plan which the government intends to propose in the other place.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, if Senator Connolly is going to close the debate, there are one or two footnotes I should like to add to the speech we have listened to from Senator Asselin.

In the first place, I think he is not correct any longer—he is a little out of date—he is not correct any longer in referring to the Queen as the British Crown. To the best of my belief, since approximately 1952, the title of the Queen has been Queen of Canada. She is Queen of various other parts of the world as well. That should be emphasized.

The second thing is, I do not recall, during the time I was on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, any representations whatsoever on the subject of the office of lieutenant governor. There may have been some before I was a member of the committee. I read a good deal of the evidence before that time, but I do not recall any representations at all on the office of lieutenant governor. I should imagine partly because most people didn't think it was a particularly critical or dangerous problem before the country. At all events, I do not recall any representations by anybody on this subject. I stand open to correction, of course, from members of that committee who were there before I was and may have heard representations which escaped my notice when I was reading the earlier parts of the evidence.

The third thing I should like to say, by way of footnote, again, to Senator Asselin's speech is that I think the low esteem in which the office of lieutenant governor may be held by especially the youth of the country—I am not quite so sure that in the provinces outside Quebec the statement holds good quite to the same extent that Senator Asselin said; however, I don't know; possibly—the fact, if it is a fact, may owe something to lack of knowledge of the constitutional functions of the lieutenant governor, and I should suggest, if I were confronted by any of these young people raising this question, they read, for example, the excellent study of the office of lieutenant-governor by Professor John Saywell of York University. They would then, I think, discover that there are circumstances which have arisen in the past, and which I am afraid could arise also in the future, where it might be necessary for the lieutenant governor to act as the guardian of the Constitution and the rights of the people.

For instance, it has not been unknown to have at least rumours that immediately after an election in a province—I am thinking particularly of the Province of British Columbia back, I think, about 1952—immediately after an election in which a government has failed to secure a clear majority, it has toyed with the idea of asking for a fresh election forthwith without allowing the new legislature to meet.

If any government were unwise enough—outrageous enough, I should say—to make such grossly unconstitutional proposal, a breach of commonsense, and of the whole basis of democratic government, it might very well be absolutely essential for the lieutenant governor to say, “No, you cannot get a fresh election until you have at least allowed this new legislature, which the people have just elected, to see whether it can transact business.”

Something very close to this, I am afraid, arose after the indecisive election in Newfoundland in 1971. The possibility arose there quite distinctly that the lieutenant governor might have to say to the premier, who appeared to be toying with the idea of a fresh election forthwith, “No, you can't do that. That is not parliamentary government. Parliamentary government means at least that a newly elected legislature should be allowed to meet and see if it can transact business.”

We had some weird and wonderful provincial premiers—we have had some in my time; quite a number of them, in various provinces—who undertook to flout the rights of the people in this fashion, or undertook to try to get a dissolution of a legislature which was discussing a motion of censure against the government and prevent that legislature from pronouncing it. In these, and various other circumstances which I shall not go into, it might be absolutely necessary for the protection of the rights of the people and the maintenance of parliamentary government that whoever is acting as head of state, whether you call him lieutenant governor or what you call him, under whatever system, should have the power to intervene and say, “No.”

I would point out to those who feel this is a peculiarly Tory, monarchical doctrine, that the Irish Constitution, which is surely clear of any such taint, expressly lays down that the head of the state—in that case the President—shall have the right in his absolute discretion to refuse a dissolution of the Irish Parliament to a prime minister who has been defeated, even defeated in the Irish Parliament. That is a further footnote that I wish to add.

As for this business of the next time round in a constitutional conference, and what might be done then, I must confess that I feel no particular acute anxiety on that subject, because it seems to me that the chance of a successful conference dealing with a revision of the Constitution is minimal. If we are waiting for that sort of thing, we should probably be waiting for the Greek Kalends.

I have no expectation whatsoever that in the immediate future any kind of constitutional conference, or any kind of discussion even by a joint committee of this house and the other house on the subject of the Constitution, will produce any result whatever which is likely to be accepted by the provinces, without whose consent it is generally assumed the Constitution cannot be changed, except insofar as this Parliament already has the power to change it under section 91, head (1), of the British North America Act.

Senator Asselin: Senator Forsey will recall that when the Joint Committee on the Constitution sat in Quebec, a youngster came before the committee and asked a question about the proposal. I do not say it was inscribed in the committee's proceedings—not at all—but I recall very well the question being asked in this regard.

Senator Forsey: I hasten to say that I stand corrected. I do not recall this. My impression still is that it was not a matter that loomed very large in the evidence.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Connolly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Asselin may have to leave very shortly, so perhaps I can deal first with the point he raised. I understand a bill has been introduced in the other place, Bill C-23, which deals with pensions for lieutenant governors of the provinces. It is a contributory plan. As I recall, the amount of contribution is 6 per cent of salary. I understand that the pension will be two-thirds of the average salary received by a lieutenant governor during the last five years of his service, if the bill is passed in its present form.

Senator Bourget: It will be three-tenths of the average salary over the last five years.

Senator Connolly: Yes, three-tenths of the average salary over the last five years.

Honourable senators are aware, of course, that if that bill is passed by the House of Commons, this house will not be able to change it. If we attempted to improve it in any way, we would be increasing the impost on the treasury, and we are not able to do that. I hope that that clause of the bill will be very carefully looked at. That is about all of the information I think I can give at this time on the bill. The pension is not very much, and I was probably out of order in mentioning it. For what it is worth, it is there.

● (1500)

I am particularly pleased that Senator Asselin raised the question of the authority and prestige of the office of lieutenant governor, and I am grateful to Senator Forsey for having dealt with the question of the Crown and the position of the Crown, both from the point of view of the provinces and of the Dominion. The monarch happens to be the monarch of the United Kingdom within the Commonwealth concept. I do not think that disaffects us in any way.

A bill of this kind not only provides an opportunity for Parliament to deal adequately with the remuneration of lieutenant governors, but also provides an opportunity to think about the office itself. When we do think about the office, and about the constitutional arrangement that was made over 100 years ago, for some of the reasons that Senator Forsey has given, and for other reasons, the wisdom of having the office of lieutenant governor becomes more and more apparent. I am not too impressed—and I am sure none of us are—with the fact that irresponsible criticism of great offices of state should appear in the press and in academic and other circles. I do not think this diminishes the value of such offices. However, the general levelling-out tendencies that we find in our society seem to apply the doctrine of the lowest common denominator. We downgrade many institutions which have very real value. The general tendency, I think, is to downgrade the idea of authority.

As far as I am concerned, people can preach equality—and validly preach equality—as much as they like. But there is nothing inconsistent between the equality of the individual and the importance of authority in society—any kind of society. One is not inconsistent with the other. What is important, I think, is the paramount urgency to understand the purposes of the various offices that are required to establish law and order within a community, within a society. These offices—and I rank the office of lieutenant governor as one of the great offices of state—are important within the constitutional framework of this country. If we understand that framework—its roots, its origins, the way it has functioned—I think we would be very loath, indeed, to start making changes aimed at doing away with some of these basic concepts and propositions.

I think our court system is a magnificent one, and yet there are times when it is criticized in a way that gives us all great concern. This chamber itself is on the firing line constantly when it comes to constitutional discussions. It is, perhaps, target number one. Yet, so much of the criticism that is directed towards this chamber comes from people who do not understand, first of all, why the Senate is here; secondly, what it does now; and, thirdly, what it can do for the future. I rather welcome hearing views in this chamber such as those which have been expressed by both Senator Forsey and Senator Asselin on this bill.

Honourable senators, I do not think there is anything more I need add at this time.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I did not want to interrupt the sponsor of the bill during the course of his remarks, but I should like to put a question to him.

I would like to know why pensions payable to judges are based on a different formula from that of the pensions to be payable to lieutenant governors. In a case of a judge, his or her pension is based on the salary received at the time of death or retirement, whereas in the case of lieutenant governors, the pension is to be based on the average salary received during the last five years in office.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, we are out of order in discussing this matter. It is the subject matter of a bill which will ultimately come to us from the other place. I think the point to be made in respect of pensions is that at present there is no pension for lieutenant governors. They receive a relatively small salary with no possibility of a pension, regardless of how many years they serve.

As to why this basis for calculating the pension has been adopted, frankly, I do not have an answer. I wish I knew the answer. I do not think it is a proper basis. In any event, I think it is a matter we will have to deal with when the other bill comes before us.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the sponsor of the bill before the debate is concluded?

On reading the introductory remarks of the sponsor of the bill I was very surprised to learn that a special fund of $100,000 was established in 1973, on a trial basis, to cover expenses incurred by lieutenant governors outside of the provincial capitals. The sponsor of the bill went on to say that resort to this fund has been relatively light; in fact, in no one year did it exceed more than $20,000.

I am thinking in particular of my area of northern Ontario, being 1,000 to 1,200 miles from the capital. This fund, it seems to me, would provide the means whereby the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Ontario could visit the remote parts of the province.

Senator Grosart: Question.

Senator Benidickson: My question to the honourable sponsor of the bill is: Has he any idea why this fund has not been utilized to a much greater extent?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I am afraid I cannot answer the honourable senator's question. Frankly, I do not know why the fund has not been more extensively used. It may be that the lieutenant governors are occupied in the capitals to the extent that they are unable to get out into other areas of the provinces. However, the opportunity is there for them to do so. In the interest of making the office of lieutenant governor and its importance better known, I think it highly desirable that this fund be used for the purposes indicated by Senator Benidickson.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a further question? As debates on matters such as this—constitutional issues—are usually the high points of our debating moments in this chamber, I think it is important to have the record completely clear in this regard.

In his very eloquent address in introducing this bill, Senator Connolly referred to the tax position of lieutenant governors. For the purpose of making the record complete, I wonder if he could inform the Senate whether or not the lieutenant governors are subject to tax, not only on their federal stipend but on any emolument they may receive, including residences, where provided, from the provincial authorities. Does a lieutenant governor pay tax on the value of the residence plus any returns from the province as well as his federal salary?

I think there is a gap in the record of the honourable senator's speech concerning the tax position.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I cannot be sure about this, but I think the facilities that are made available by a province to be used by the lieutenant governor are facilities for the advantage of all the people of the province of which he or she is lieutenant governor. It is not a personal benefit to the lieutenant governor and, in my view, would not be included in his or her tax computation.

Senator McIlraith mentioned to me one point following the last question, and I think, perhaps, this may close the debate. The fact that the lieutenant governor's term of office is a good deal shorter than that of the normal term of a judge of a superior, county, circuit or district court probably has a good deal to do with the kind of pension that is available.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, Her Honour the Speaker has already indicated that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will be here this afternoon at 5.45. This bill will be useful to the lieutenant governors only upon passage and royal assent. It might, therefore, be appropriate to suggest that it be read the third time today so that it can receive royal assent today.

I move, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Miss Bégin and Messrs. Stollery and Landers had been substituted for those of Messrs. NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the following message has been received from the House of Commons:

Senator Perrault: With leave, I move that consideration be given on Thursday next.

Senator Flynn: You mean tomorrow?

Senator Croll: That is Thursday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1975

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-64, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1976.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave, I move second reading now.

Senator Flynn: On the question of leave, I should like to hear from the Deputy Leader of the Government as to why we should proceed with this bill right away, unless the Leader of the Government himself wants to speak on this matter.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the main reasons for asking leave to proceed now are, first of all, that we are nearing the summer recess; also, the first interim supply bill provided for supplies up to June 30 next, and I am informed that the other place will likely not sit on Monday or Tuesday next. So, if this bill is to be passed and given royal assent before June 30, it will have to be dealt with this week.

Those are the main reasons for seeking leave to proceed now.

● (1410)

Senator Flynn: With respect to the other house's not sitting on Monday or Tuesday, I can understand that, especially on Tuesday; it is against their rules. I am quite sure, however, that it would not make much difference if the bill only received royal assent next week, on July 2 or 3. After all, the only problem is to pay the civil service, and there will not be any rush until July 15.

The other question I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government is this. If we were to start dealing with this bill today and complete the second reading debate and examination of the bill this week, is there any possibility that we might refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in order to hear from the Minister of Finance? I think that if this bill were sent to committee it would provide the opportunity to direct some questions to the minister. After Monday evening's budget speech, these questions appear not only warranted but imperative. I should like to know if the deputy leader has changed his mind about the possibility of referring such a bill to our Finance Committee.

Senator Langlois: My good friend the Leader of the Opposition knows it is very easy to make me change my mind. Unfortunately, I cannot change the rules of this house. That is the main reason.

Senator Flynn: If you cannot, I will not accept that they cannot be changed.

Senator Langlois: On the other hand, though I cannot give any definite undertaking at this stage, we are presently planning to adjourn this week until July 7 for the reason that, as honourable senators know, in the other place there is a six-day debate on the budget, and there are two sitting days that will be lost, next Monday and Tuesday, since the other place has decided not to sit then. Consequently, there is a delay of eight days during which we cannot expect to receive any legislation from the other place, and for that reason we are at this time planning to adjourn this week until Monday, July 7. That is an additional reason why we are seeking leave to proceed with this interim supply measure today.

Senator Flynn: I would be willing to give leave if the deputy leader would not say that he cannot change the rules of the house. When he says we cannot refer this bill to the Finance Committee, he is not saying what the rules say. He knows that. If he is willing to withdraw that contention I will give leave.

Senator Langlois: There is another reason why I cannot change my position. As my honourable friend knows, this matter is presently under consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, and I would not at this stage like to prejudge the decision of that committee.

Senator Flynn: You do not have to prejudge the decision of the committee. You merely have to follow the rules as they are.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the deputy leader might be interested in knowing what the rule is at the present moment.

Senator Langlois: I know very well.

Senator Grosart: Rule 67(h) says:

The Senate Committee on National Finance, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to federal estimates generally, including—certain things. If an appropriation bill is not a matter relating to estimates, I do not know what it is.

Senator Langlois: This involves a question of interpretation that is now being studied in the Rules Committee, I understand. My honourable friend knows that very well. I would be in a very awkward position if I were at this stage, as I said, to prejudge the decision of this worthwhile committee of this house.

Senator Grosart: We are only talking about the rules as they are now.

Senator Langlois: Your interpretation of them.

Senator Flynn: In order to be able to assess the position of the deputy leader we will let this matter stand for a while, probably until tomorrow.

Senator Langlois: That is a wise decision. Thank you.

Senator Argue: Then you will give in gracefully.

Senator Flynn: Don't be too sure. Leave is not granted. You can ask again tomorrow. The wait may do wonders for your disposition.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting?

Senator Flynn: Not for the next sitting, for Friday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading—

Senator Flynn: Friday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: —Friday next.

Senator Langlois: Who is moving the motion? Madam Speaker, I am moving that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Langlois: We will sit on Saturday if you want to.

Senator Flynn: Friday next; that is fair enough.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Langlois: No.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Perrault: In the light of these developments, may I suggest that honourable senators should revise their travel plans, because there is every possibility that we may meet on Saturday to discuss this important matter of interim supply.

Senator Flynn: Very good.

Senator Langlois: And next week, possibly, too.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: What motion?

Senator Flynn: Do you never give in? Why should we always give in?

Senator Croll: Why don't you?

Senator Flynn: Why don't you give in and let the bill go to committee, and you can start on second reading right away?

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the adoption of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators against the adoption of the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. The motion is defeated.

Senator Bourget: How do we stand now?

Senator Grosart: Somebody over there had better learn the rules. You are in a real mess now.

Senator Langlois: We will sit next week. We will sit on Sunday if you want to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to ask when this bill will be read the second time.

Some Hon. Senators: Next sitting.

Senator Flynn: You cannot have leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Langlois, seconded by Senator Perrault, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading—

Senator Langlois: On Friday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: —on Friday next. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "LES BEAUX DIMANCHES"—REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications which was authorized to examine and report upon the matter of the program entitled "Les beaux dimanches," televised on April 28, 1974, on the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Honourable senators, I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, pp. 1118-1120.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bourget moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I would ask leave to give a short explanation of the report at this time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Bourget: On October 31, 1974, Senator Langlois, seconded by Senator Denis, P.C., moved "that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the matter of the program entitled "Un show qui m'tente avec du monde que j'aime", televised on April 28, 1974, on the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation". Following discussions, this motion was referred to the said committee, as evidenced by the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for October 31, 1974.

The purpose of this motion was to enable the committee to use this program to evaluate the programming of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to meeting its objectives under the Broadcasting Act.

The committee held two meetings during which the President of the CBC, some of his officials, and the Chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission appeared. The steering committee met twice and the committee held three meetings in camera to examine and prepare its report.

When we met with CBC officials for the first time, some committee members suggested that this program made use of vulgar, offensive and ambiguous expressions which meant to ridicule the constitutional authority of our country and jeopardize our national unity.

Some committee members suggested also that this program had to be assessed in conjunction with the political climate in the province of Quebec, emphasizing that it had a separatist content.

It was also a question of the control and supervision exercised by the CBC over this type of program.

At the last sitting during which the chairman of the CRTC was heard, the main questions concerned section 3 of the act, which establishes the broadcasting policy for Canada, as well as the control and supervision the CRTC may exercise over such programs.

After discussion, members of the committee came to realize that the control and supervision system used by the CRTC proved inadequate.

In its conclusions, the committee should like to point out that it has no desire of becoming a censoring body, but rather wishes to see to it that the objectives, as stated in the Broadcasting Act, be respected.

That is why the committee wishes to stress, on all those in charge of carrying out the legislation, the shortcomings that were noted in the course of our study so that such failures may be remedied.

This report, honourable senators, has been approved by all committee members, and I now take pleasure in submitting it to your kind attention.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the fifth report of the committee as follows:

[English]

Thursday, June 12, 1975

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Fifth Report as follows:

Your Committee proposes to continue its review and scrutiny of statutory instruments during the adjournment of Parliament in the summer of 1975.

Your committee therefore recommends, notwithstanding an Order of the Senate of Tuesday, October 29, 1974, respecting the quorum of the committee, that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings during the forthcoming summer recess to receive and authorize the printing of evidence when three members of the committee are present, provided both Houses are represented.

Respectfully submitted,

Eugene A. Forsey,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Forsey moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Bourget.]

THE BUDGET

SPECIAL EXCISE TAX ON GASOLINE—QUESTIONS

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, because the Leader of the Government is not in his place right now, could the deputy leader clarify two points with respect to the new federal tax on gasoline that was announced in the budget speech on Monday night?

In the first place, will he please tell us at precisely what point in the marketing process this tax becomes payable? Is it payable immediately the gasoline is refined, and does it apply to all inventory stocks held by the refineries, or is it payable at the time the gasoline is distributed through the wholesale outlets to the retailers?

Secondly, could the deputy leader tell us the precise time the tax became payable at the retail outlets? I ask this because from what I have heard since Monday night, some retailers levied the tax commencing at midnight that night, others started at noon on Tuesday, and some, I understand, have not started yet. I think this is due to confusion as to whether the tax is payable on gasoline in inventory prior to the announcement in the budget. There seems to be great confusion on this point. Could the deputy leader clarify these two points for us?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I realize the importance and the urgency of this question, but as my honourable friend is asking for an interpretation of a speech made in the other place by the Minister of Finance, it would be imprudent on my part to try to give an answer now, without referring the matter to him. I will do that, and as soon as I have the information I will gladly give a response to this question.

Senator Flynn: Would the deputy leader permit a supplementary question? Does he not think that if we had the Minister of Finance before our National Finance Committee he might be in a good position to give replies to such questions as these?

Senator Langlois: As my honourable friend knows from his long experience in both Houses of Parliament, there is no budget debate in the Senate.

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: Is the deputy leader suggesting that we should not be interested in this matter?

Senator Langlois: It is not a question of being interested.

Senator Flynn: We certainly could discuss it if we had the Minister of Finance before a committee of this house. I do not see the reason for this stubborn refusal.

Senator Langlois: You are making compliments as usual.

Senator Flynn: Well, "stubbornness" may be used as a compliment occasionally.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I can appreciate what the deputy leader has said, but from the standpoint of the public there is real urgency in having this matter clarified. It is not sitting very well with the public to find that some consumers have been paying the tax since midnight Monday and others are not paying it yet. This is not the kind of thing that can sit for a week before it is clarified. There is need for immediate clarification so that both the public and the distributors will understand what their responsibility is.

Senator Walker: There is a very simple answer which could be given by those who should know, Mr. Deputy Leader. I am saying this with the greatest deference to you. The budget can be debated, as you know, when the appropriations come up again. There is no reason at all why we cannot debate the budget at that time. But we should have an immediate answer to this question, because this extra tax on gasoline is one of the most enormous and improvident parts of any budget we have ever had in this country.

Senator Perrault: Questions of detail with respect to the budget will be clarified, of course, during the budget debate now under way in the other place. Detailed information of that kind should be readily available in the course of that debate.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to object to the statement made by the Leader of the Government. The budget debate does not have as its object the clarification of the decisions or the proposals made by the Minister of Finance in the budget speech. It deals with the whole subject of the economic condition of the country. Members in the other place can put questions to the Minister of Finance which he is able to answer right away. I want senators to have the same advantage by having the minister before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. We have a perfect occasion, the examination of an appropriation bill, which we could start in on this afternoon were it not again for the stubborn refusal of the government to allow such a bill to go before the National Finance Committee where the minister might be questioned.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Opposition requires some specific information with respect to aspects of the budget which in his view require clarification, I shall certainly undertake to obtain the necessary information as quickly as possible. I give this undertaking with respect to any part of the budget. There is certainly no effort on the part of the government to withhold information from the Opposition, which has every right to know the details.

Senator Flynn: I did not suggest there was. During the leader's absence the deputy leader said in reply to a question from Senator Manning that he could not reply for the Minister of Finance. So, I suggest that we have a good way to get these answers from the minister himself by referring the appropriation bill to the committee.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT OLD AGE ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill C-62, to amend the Old Age Security Act, to repeal the Old Age Assistance Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, the Government of Canada has for several years now been carrying out an extensive review of federal social security policies and programs with a view to developing jointly with the provinces a broad income maintenance program which at the same time would be more comprehensive, more streamlined and easier to administer. In 1970 the federal government published a document entitled The White Paper on Income Security for Canadians, which set forth various proposals in connection with the Canada Pension Plan. In April of 1973 the government published another document, entitled The Working Paper on Social Security in Canada. This initiated a joint federal-provincial review of the whole social security system. Since that date the federal and provincial Ministers of Welfare have been meeting periodically and, as consensus has been reached on certain proposals, the necessary legislative action has been taken to enact them into law.

Honourable senators will recall that on November 12, 1974, I sponsored a bill to amend the Canada Pension Plan. Today I am happy to have the honour to introduce Bill C-62, which represents another step, a step which is perhaps more limited than many of us would wish but nevertheless a step forward toward the construction of a more complete social security system.

To see Bill C-62 in its proper context it is perhaps worth while to review the development of our social security program to date. The British North America Act placed the responsibility for social security on the provinces, and prior to 1927 each province paid its own old age pension at rates that varied from $20 per month in the richest provinces, all the way down to $50 per year in the poorest provinces. In 1927 Parliament approved the Old Age Pension Act, whereby the federal government undertook to pay 50 per cent of the cost of provincial pensions administered in conjunction with a means test. That was still the situation when I arrived on the scene here in Ottawa in 1949. In 1950 a parliamentary committee studied the subject, and one of the shining lights of that committee was our esteemed friend and colleague Senator Croll.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Carter: That committee recommended that the means test be abolished and that old age pensions be made universal at age 70. This resulted in the Old Age Security Act, which was passed in 1951 and became law on January 1, 1952. A fund was established, known as the Old Age Security Fund, which was financed by taxation on a 2-2-2 basis. The committee also recommended that Canadians over 65 and under 70 years of age be eligible for assistance in accordance with a means test. A companion piece of legislation, entitled the Old Age Assistance Act, was passed at the same time to take care of this group.

The next step forward was taken in 1965, when universality was extended, one year at a time, from 70 years of age to 65 years of age. In 1966 the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan were introduced. At the same time the guaranteed income supplement, which initially was intended to be a transitional program to take care of those who would not be able to take part in these pension plans, was also introduced. However, in 1970 the guaranteed income supplement was placed on a permanent basis, as an integral part of our social security system. In 1968 both the basic old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement were increased by 2 per cent annually, as partial compensation for increases in the cost of living. In May 1972 the 2 per cent ceiling was removed to permit payments to increase by the full amount of the consumer price index. These adjustments were changed to a quarterly basis in October 1973.

● (1440)

We come now to Bill C-62, the main purpose of which is to provide assistance under certain prescribed conditions to couples where one spouse is in receipt of the Old Age Pension and Guaranteed Income Supplement and the other spouse is under 65 years of age, so that two people are forced to live on the social security income provided for one person. In many cases these couples undergo severe hardships, and this bill is designed to alleviate this problem by providing assistance to spouses between the ages of 60 and 65, under certain prescribed conditions and in accordance with a means test or, more accurately, an income test.

It is estimated there are about 750,000 to 800,000 Canadians between the ages of 60 and 65. Bill C-62 will apply to only a small fraction—between 10 per cent and 12 per cent—of them. In fact, it will apply only to those who are spouses of old age pensioners, and who can also produce a marriage certificate or a declaration under oath of common law relationship as well as meeting the residential conditions and the requirements of the income test. This is an easily definable specific group with a specific need for assistance which this bill is designed to remedy. The cost involved is estimated at around $100 million.

The fact that the bill extends coverage to certain spouses under certain conditions introduces a new element and a new concept into the Old Age Security Act, which hitherto has applied to individuals as individuals without their marital state being a condition of eligibility. Apart from that, however, the residential requirements, the formula for calculating payments, and other features are the same as set forth in the Old Age Security Act.

If honourable senators look at the Old Age Security Act they will find that it is divided into three parts. Part I entitled "Monthly Pension" includes sections 3 to 7 inclusive; Part II entitled "Monthly Guaranteed Income Supplement" includes sections 8 to 17 inclusive; and Part III entitled "General" includes sections 18 to 26 inclusive.

The meat of Bill C-62 is to be found in clause 5 on page 3, which is headed Part II.1 and entitled "Spouse's Allowance." This Part II.1 is really an extension of section 17 of the act, and it includes a number of subclauses running from 17.1(1) on page 3 to 17.8(2) at the top of page 9. These new sections that follow section 17 of the Old Age Security Act, as set forth under clause 5 of the bill, include the definition of spouse, the manner of application for payment, the conditions under which payments may be made or withheld, provisions for retroactivity and reinstatement, for the making of necessary regulations, and for several consequential amendments to the Old Age Security Act arising out of these provisions and the introduction of the term "spouse" and its definition.

I am informed that regulations are required to provide the flexibility that is so essential in administering this type of legislation. For example, payments made to the spouse are conditional upon the couple living together. Clause 5 includes a new addition to section 17 of the Old Age Security Act—that is clause 17.3(1) on page 5 of the bill—which specifies that the allowances be suspended if the spouse is sentenced to a jail term exceeding 90 days. If the jail term is less than 90 days, the payments continue. Payments, however, are suspended when the recipient reaches the age of 65 and qualifies for the Old Age Security pension.

However, there are other types of separation, such as those caused by illness, accidents, travelling conditions, and other such causes, which cannot be provided for in the legislation and therefore must be dealt with by regulations so that each case can be considered on its merits.

The spouse's allowance also ceases should the other spouse die. This is a matter of particular concern, because the payments stop at a time when the surviving spouse is burdened with sorrow at the loss of a partner, and also when there are likely to be extra expenses such as funeral expenses and unpaid debts. One would have hoped that provisions could have been made to enable payments to continue for at least 60 days after death of the spouse in respect of whom the payments were being made.

This question was explored in the other place and in the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, where the chairman ruled that the royal recommendation—must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge but also its object, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount but also if it extends the object and purposes or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communications by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge. And this standard is binding not only on private members but also on ministers whose only advantage is that, as advisers of the Crown, they can present new or supplementary estimates or secure the royal recommendation to new or supplementary resolutions.

Since the Old Age Security Act was being opened up for the purpose of providing spouses' allowances, advantage has been taken of this opportunity to do some tidying up of the act and to add some minor improvements. For example, the last time the Old Age Security Act was amended, the words "consumer price index" were inadvertently omitted from subsection 4(4)(d), and this has now been remedied by clause 2 of the bill before us.

A new section is also being added to follow section 6 of the Old Age Security Act. This amendment is set forth under clause 3 of the bill, and permits the minister to enter into agreement with provinces providing benefits similar to the guaranteed income supplement and spouse's allowance in order to include such payments in Old Age Security cheques on a cost-recovery basis.

Section 11 of the act has to do with calculation of income, and section 11(a) has been rewritten to include the words "spouse's allowance under this Act." This amendment, which is set forth in clause 4 of the bill, is consequential upon clause 5. It adds "spouse's allowance" to the list of income that is exempt from calculation for the purposes of the guaranteed income supplement or spouse's allowance.

Clauses 6 and 7 of the bill are also consequential on clause 5. Clause 6 adds a new subsection (1.1) to section 18 of the Old Age Security Act, and provides for appeals against decisions made by officials with respect to eligibility, entitlement, amount of payments, and questions of that nature.

Clause 7 repeals section 20(f) of the Old Age Security Act and substitutes a new section 20(f) to provide authority for making regulations whereby periods of prescribed absence from Canada would not interrupt presence in Canada for Old Age Security purposes. It also adds section 20(f.1), which deals with cases where the amount of the spouse's allowance does not exceed $2 per month. It would permit the establishment of a regulation whereby such payments could be paid monthly or, in certain cases, at less frequent intervals such as quarterly or half-yearly payments. Subclause (2) of clause 7 provides for the regulations that I mentioned earlier whereby definitions would be drawn up of the types of separations that would disqualify the spouse's allowance.

Clause 8 is also a new addition. It has to do with overpayments made through error which cannot be recovered without causing hardship to the individual or the couple concerned. It provides that where a person has received a benefit to which he is not entitled, and the minister is satisfied that such an amount cannot be collected within the foreseeable future, or that the cost of collecting would equal or exceed the amount involved, or that the payment would be a hardship, the minister may remit all or any portion of the amount, if such person has not been convicted of an offence under the Old Age Security Act in connection with such an amount.

This provision brings the Old Age Security Act into line with the Canada Pension Plan, the War Veterans Allowance Act, and similar legislation.

I mentioned earlier that pensions to people over 70 were paid universally as a matter of right when the Old Age Security Act became law on January 1, 1952. That act established a fund to be known as the Old Age Security Fund. Clause 9 abolishes the Old Age Security Fund and provides that in future all benefits be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

I also pointed out earlier that the Old Age Assistance Act, which also became law on January 1, 1952, provided benefits for Canadians between the ages of 65 and 70, in accordance with a means test. That law became inoperable when the old age pension became universal at the age of 65. In actual fact, payments under the Old Age Assistance Act ceased in 1970, and clause 10 of the bill repeals it altogether as a housekeeping measure.

Clause 11 is consequential on clause 10. It deletes all references to the Old Age Assistance Act in the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act, the Canada Assistance Plan, and other related legislation.

Clause 12 amends section 56(1)(a)(i)(A) of the Income Tax Act by adding the words "or spouse's allowance", which amendment is consequential on clause 5.

Honourable senators, Bill C-62, in spite of its limited application, does nevertheless meet a very real need and represents another step forward in our social legislation. I therefore commend it to you for your support. If it is the wish of the Senate to have this bill referred to committee once debate on second reading has been concluded, I shall be only too happy to make such a motion.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

STATUTE LAW (STATUS OF WOMEN) AMENDMENT BILL, 1974

SECOND READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-16, to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, I have been in luck because, almost every time I moved the adoption of a bill, it has been passed unanimously in the other place. And I hope honourable senators will approve this one in the same fashion.

It is also a privilege to please more than 50 per cent of the Canadian people, those charming ladies who for so long have been deserving and asking for equal rights and obligations. The amendments proposed in Bill C-16 go a step further in that direction. By introducing this legislation, the government makes a positive contribution to International Women's Year and once more demonstrates its will to improve the status of the fair sex.

I wish to concur in a suggestion put forward by Mr. Georges Vigny in an editorial published in Le Devoir of Friday last on the matter of mutual respect between both sexes. I quote:

"Respect, let's make it clear at the outset, does not in any way mean hand-kissing or hat-raising, and even less sweet talk. It means participation by both halves of society, working together to develop the country. It means that this country needs everyone's contribution in order to go forward."

And the editorial further states:

"This also implies that we should strive, not to replace an unjust society by another as unjust, a men's society by a women's society, but to promote human, social, economical and political progress through the integration of every living force."

[English]

May I add that the Senate has done justice to the status of women in its organization. In the present membership of the Senate there are six charming and intelligent lady senators, out of a total of 91.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Denis: That compares favourably with the membership of the other place where there are eight lady members out of a total of 264.

The Senate has done justice to women also insofar as its staff is concerned. Presently, we have two lady heads of branches, namely, the Chief of English Minutes and Journals and the Chief of the French Minutes and Journals. In addition, we have a lady committee clerk. The office of the Leader of the Government is graced with two ladies as special assistants.

May I also add that the Senate has been innovative in hiring graceful girls as pages.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Denis: There are a number of other positions, such as those of supervising officers of the secretarial services and other senior clerical positions, which are held by women. The personnel policy of the Senate is that all Senate competitions are open to all employees and the best qualified candidate is selected, regardless of sex.

● (1500)

Senator Grosart: Or politics.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, for some years the present government has taken a serious look at this problem, particularly in 1967 when it set up the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and in 1973 when it set up an Advisory Council on the Status of Women. In 1970, the royal commission in its report made 167 recommendations of which 122 come under the federal government. In that respect, 69 of them were implemented. Of the 53 recommendations not yet implemented, 11 are dealt with in bills now being considered in the other place, 9 are currently being considered at the administrative level and 4 are contained in this bill. I am also thinking about the recent legislation just introduced by my honourable colleague Senator Carter which will allow the wife to draw a pension at 60 when her spouse is already a pensioner.

Honourable senators, the amendments proposed by this bill deal with the following acts: the Elections Act, the Criminal Code, the Immigration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Pension Act, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the National Defence Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and the Canada Labour Code.

A few examples will be enough I think to convince you of the benefits of this particular law with respect to the status of women.

The Elections Act is amended in that the short designation of Mrs. or Miss will no longer appear on election lists, and a woman will be able to give her name and surname as she wishes, that is the name and surname under which she is known, without necessarily using her husband's name.

An amendment to the Criminal Code is to eliminate the protection of the law in favour of the married woman whose husband committed a crime and who helped an accomplice of her husband to escape.

Another amendment gives the wife the same rights and the same duties as the husband concerning the obligation to provide for the spouse or the children, or both.

The Immigration Act is amended so that the head of the family will be the mother, just as much as the father, depending on which supports the spouse and the children.

With regard to employment in the civil service, the merit system and the standards for classification and selection do away with discrimination against women.

The amendment to the Pension Act stipulates the equality of status for all members of the armed forces of both sexes, and confers upon them equal rights and obligations.

[Senator Denis.]

For instance, if both spouses are pensioned, they will receive separate pensions as though they were not married. Further on, this bill prescribes the same age limit for children of both sexes who are eligible to a pension.

Another clause grants the married status to the person who keeps a member of the armed forces, or is kept by him or her, or lives with him or her for three years, and who is recognized and introduced as the spouse of the member, or as the widow upon his death.

Amendments to the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act now allow the payment of a pension to the widow who, to a large extent, provided for her spouse or was provided for by him before death.

The National Defence Act is also amended in that it will allow girls to belong to cadet organizations, just as boys do.

Finally, the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971 and the Labour Code are being amended so as to allow women a far more flexible period during which maternity benefits are paid, that is, giving her the choice as to which 15 weeks she is entitled to allowances, before or after giving birth.

Honourable senators, I have attempted to sum up for you, in my own way, a few of the clauses in this bill. Despite the fact that it was unanimously passed in the other house, I shall gladly submit to your wishes to have it referred to the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for further and more precise explanations by officials of the different departments responsible for implementing the legislation contained in this bill.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of this bill.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, first of all, I should like to congratulate the sponsor of this bill, Senator Denis, who has done such a good job. If Senator Denis and I have agreed to discuss this bill, it is not because we are well versed on the matter but because we were willing to obey orders from our leaders. This will enable all of us in this house to express our ideas, criticisms and observations on the main points of the bill.

How can we achieve woman's socio-economic integration?

Today we have arrived at a turning point in the history and fate of womankind. This is not just a beginning, since many events have prepared the setting for this great moment.

Woman is at the forefront. Everyone knows that she is entitled to play a part in society.

The theme of International Women's Year is: equality, development and peace. Today, when we talk about the full social economic integration of women into our society, we no longer ask why or when, but how this will happen.

Since the creation of the United Nations in 1945, a great deal of progress was made as concerns the situation and status of women throughout the world. Many legal steps have been taken and are still being taken to give them political, economical, social and family rights equal to those of men. However, it is impossible to change overnight the traditions, attitudes and customs of thousands of years, and the gap between the law and reality remains wide.

In the political field, for instance, in 1945, women did not yet have the franchise in about one third of the 51 member countries of the United Nations. Today, in 124 member states, women can legally vote and be elected just like men.

However, the percentage of women in key positions at the local, national or international level remains low. In New Zealand, for instance,—the first nation to enfranchise women in 1893—92 per cent of all candidates and 95 per cent of those elected in the 1972 election were men. In Egypt, during the 1967 election, 76 per cent of the women abstained from voting.

Moreover, here in Canada we can perhaps pride ourselves on having had the first woman Speaker of this house and of having been able to serve under the present Madam Speaker, who is a great credit to the Upper House. However, I believe that there should be many more women in this house, especially today. In a similar speech in this House in 1971, I deplored the fact that there were so few women in the House of Commons, in our Canadian legislatures, as well as in our superior courts.

At the international level, the picture is equally sad. In 1973, for instance, at the 28th UN general meeting, which I had the privilege to attend, there were only 180 women out of 2,369 representatives, no women in the delegations of 55 countries and only one in the delegations of 44 countries.

In the economic field as well, considerable progress has been achieved during the last 25 years.

In 1945, the right of women to work and to equal working conditions—including the thorny problem of equal salary for equal work—was strongly discussed, even within the International Labour Organization. Today those problems have become rights acknowledged as such and enforced in practice, even if that enforcement is slow and progressive.

A certain number of conventions and recommendations adopted by ILO served as yardsticks to have those rights accepted by the public opinion, particularly the 1951 convention on equal salary for male and female workers for work of equal value and the 1958 convention on discrimination in employment and professions.

Nevertheless, the 562-odd million women who represent 34 per cent of the world labour force—38 per cent in industrialized countries and 32 per cent in underdeveloped countries—are confined to a small number of jobs requiring very few qualifications and responsibilities and consequently are low paid. In practice, their work is not considered as being equal to that of men and, for the same work, their pay is often lower.

In addition, those figures do not take into account the millions of women who toil from morning till night at unpaid agricultural or domestic tasks. There are no statistics to tell us the number of women living under such conditions and what is the importance of their production and return.

It is especially in the developed world through educational measures that some progress has been realized to eradicate the prejudices and discriminatory policies which have their source in the clichés on the respective role of the sexes. This progress is partly due to a few measures: reforms in the establishment of programs; increased flexibility in the choice of courses; boys and girls, for example, study mathematics, sciences as well as domestic sciences; they both receive sexual and family education.

Whatever the level of analphabetism, the proportion of women who cannot read is always higher than that of men. In 1960, the rates of analphabetism were 33 per cent for men and 44 per cent for women. In 1970, these rates were 28 and 40 per cent respectively. In Africa and the Arab states, during the same decade, these rates fell from 88 and 90 per cent to 83 and 85 respectively.

In spite of the tremendous effort made by many countries to set up special classes to teach adults how to read, there are always a lot fewer women attending these classes than men. This results from a number of factors, such as the distance to cover to reach the schools, the difficulties of night travelling, household chores, early marriages, archaic attitudes, and the lack of facilities and teaching staff.

Maternity is an area where inequalities should exist. Because of the absence of women in the decision-making process with regard to health, people in charge are not aware of needs in the area of maternal protection. This is one of the most neglected sectors of public health in many countries.

The effectiveness of health services hinges to a large extent on the available resources and personnel. However, considerable progress could be achieved in this area, thanks to cheaply obtained training in health, nutrition, domestic science and preventive medicine.

While we try to improve the quality of life for all human beings, we do not insist enough on the needs of millions of children and mothers, particularly in developing areas, in rural as well as in urban areas. How could we improve the quality of life for any human being born of an illiterate, economically dependent, undernourished, overworked, and physically deficient woman who gives birth to a child a year?

We have before us an omnibus bill designed to correct certain inequities between men and women in those legislative and policy areas over which the federal government has control. It is fitting that in International Women's Year, which has for its theme equality, development and peace, the government should adjust acts in order that the sexes be not treated differently. I find I must agree, however, with my Liberal opponent in the other place, that the Statute Law (Status of Women) Amendment Act, 1974 "would have been good legislation in 1954." In 1974, it is certainly no earth-shattering contribution to the cause of female equality.

This is not to say that the bill is not positive as far as it goes. It does mark an advance in implementation of the 122 recommendations of the 1970 Status of Women Report which fall within federal jurisdiction, in that the bill responds to approximately half a dozen inequalities to which the commission has called attention. However, it has taken five years to accomplish 60 per cent implementation of these recommendations.

The amendments to many of the bills are not major. In some cases they will improve the status of women; in other cases they may mean removal of former privileges. What is more important about these legislative changes is the ability of the amendments to reflect a change in attitudes whereby a woman can take her rightful place in the social, political and economic life of this country. On the woman's part, this will mean giving up her enshrined and protected position as a member of the traditionally-termed "weaker sex" to assume an equal role which entails responsibilities as well as rights. This will obviously be a slow process since sexual stereotypes are hard to put down. Just how hard can be seen in the sections of the Criminal Code under amendment where the term "his spouse" remains to remind us that this is still an acceptable definition under the terms of that piece of legislation.

● (1520)

That the obligation of spouses to provide the necessities of life for their partner should depend on monetary ability rather than sex is only fitting.

Senator Choquette: Order.

Senator Bélisle: It also certainly makes sense that inequalities relating to pension privileges should be removed in order to allow full equality for male and female contributors and beneficiaries under the act.

I wonder if the conversation which Senator Carter is having with someone at the far end of the chamber is more important than my speech? Certainly, they are making more noise than I am. As a rule when a senator speaks in this house, those who are not particularly interested at least have the courtesy to be patient and to be silent.

Senator Choquette: Hear, hear! Good. We are listening to you.

Senator Bélisle: I do not make a speech merely to be heard. I make a speech, as I have said, in order to make a contribution.

If I may continue, I also welcome the idea that female cadets should be able to take their place beside their male counterparts in cadet organizations. I cannot see why the combat training role of our military colleges should preclude the application of this same principle to those establishments. After all, women of various countries have provided valuable assistance in the field, in a service or combat capacity, during periods of crisis as part of their national obligation. Surely those women who would choose to attend a military college in order to pursue a military career should have the opportunity to do so.

In the area of employment, removal of discrimination by reason of marital status is a positive step. The Human Rights Commission legislation to be introduced will, hopefully, reinforce the action against practices of discrimination based on sex—the principal rationale of the majority of the amendments.

The amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, in my opinion, however, is qualitatively different and represents a more serious change of approach. Unemployment insurance is a social insurance program which provides experienced members of the labour force with temporary partial replacement of wages lost because of unemployment due to lack of work. In a very real sense, unemployment insurance is the worker's first and often only line of protection against the risks of involuntary unemployment.

There is some question whether this legislation is the best vehicle for maternity benefits, but it appears to present the most viable scheme by which women who are active members of the labour force can be uniformly paid maternity benefits. Wives and mothers are an accepted economic entity in the labour force; they should not be discriminated against because they participate in the economic life of the nation. The fact that one worker in six is a married woman is an index of our nation-wide dependence on their services. A woman in the labour force who is temporarily out of work during the weeks immediately before and after confinement should be entitled to protection. Through the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, Canada is committed to the principle of paid maternity leave.

In this connection I must admit I have some reservations about the breadth of the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I understand a review of the act is presently being conducted but that, unfortunately, the provisions relating to maternity benefits are being dealt with in a piecemeal fashion.

I am most gratified that the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act made in committee makes even more flexible the provisions for benefits for maternity leave, allowing the recipient a leeway of a total of 26 weeks during which period she may choose to take her 15 weeks of benefits. Formerly, women who worked closer to their times of confinement were really penalized in relation to those who took leave early. A woman may now choose according to personal need. I should note that this does not match the typical Scandinavian provisions of six months' leave following confinement, but it is a recognition that maternity benefits require an approach which is different from that of the regular provisions of the legislation.

Other provisions that remain do not evidence this new flexibility. The criterion of eligibility, which requires the claimant to have worked 20 weeks within the year preceding the claim or since the last unemployment insurance claim, is more stringent than provisions relating to the regular employment. Although the 20-week stipulation is in line with the sickness provision, it may create problems for a permanent member of the working force who experiences a lay-off and then, because of a subsequent pregnancy, is unable to accumulate 20 weeks of prior employment in that year. But even if a claimant has worked the required 20 weeks in order to fulfil the "major attachment" requirement, she must fulfil an additional criterion, which is to have worked between the 30th and 50th week prior to the expected delivery. In effect, women who join the labour force after conception, but fulfil the 20-week requirement of a "major attachment," can be prevented from qualifying for benefits.

Moreover, why is it necessary to have a two-week waiting period before the claimant can qualify for benefits? A period of five to seven weeks may in fact ensue before benefits are received. The spirit of the legislation implies full payment of maternity benefits to claimants during the time in which they are deprived of income by reason of maternity leave. Pregnant women who have established their right to maternity benefits should not have to serve a waiting period.'

One also might ask why maternity benefits must be treated on a par with sickness benefits to the extent that the maximum available is 15 weeks' maternity and sickness inclusive. Another point of contention is the fact that pregnant women who lose their employment because of labour disputes may not be entitled to receive maternity benefits since striking workers are disqualified from receiving benefits.

Senator Choquette: What kind of labour are you referring to there?

Senator Bélisle: I am referring to ordinary labour in order to qualify for unemployment; not the type of labour you may have in mind.

I list these questions which come to my mind only to make evident that the change in the Unemployment Insurance Act dealing with maternity benefits leaves several questions unanswered which I hope will be considered at the time of the general review of the act. Perhaps we can delve further into these outstanding problems in committee.

This year will be what we will make it. It can in fact be historic not only with respect to the promotion of women, but also for the progress of mankind as a whole. Let's make sure of it.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Denis speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I do not know how to thank Senator Bélisle for the nice things he said about me. I wonder if it is because I voted the same way he did recently that he is grateful to me. But with the support I am also getting from this side of the house, I suppose I am forgiven that small step aside. It is certainly in honour of the celebration of International Women's Year that the Opposition, as well as our party, shows so much sympathy for a bill which will improve the condition of the fair sex. Most important of all, I need only think about the two charming and intelligent women who were called to preside over our proceedings in the last two Parliaments.

There again the Senate was the innovator. I seize the opportunity to pay homage to Madam Speaker. I thank Senator Bélisle for his valuable contribution, which was not only enlightening but, I would say, educational. The amendments in the bill pleased him. He wished the bill had been passed in 1954, but he forgot to say that in 1958, 1959, 1960 and 1961, his party had the opportunity to revenge itself for the lack of concern of the present government. But, as the saying goes, Rome was not built in a day. It is up to all of us to keep on fighting for complete equality for women.

With regard to the waiting period for women who become ill, as far as unemployment insurance benefits are concerned they will enjoy the same status as men.

I do not have much else to add save perhaps that, to my mind, it is not absolutely necessary for us to request the appearance of the representatives of all the departments affected by this bill. They have work to do in their respective offices. Finally, I do not feel the bill requires referral to committee. I would not say, as one of my colleagues did, that the bill is simple—he got knocked for that—I would say instead that it is complex but that honourable senators understand it in spite of that. I therefore move second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Denis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy.—(Honourable Senator Carter).

Senator Carter: Stand until later this day.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I beg leave to revert to notices of motion.

Senator Flynn: For what purpose?

Senator Langlois: To give notice.

Senator Flynn: Notice of what?

Senator Langlois: A notice of motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn until 8 o'clock this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that the Senate do now adjourn to reassemble at approximately 8 o'clock this evening. Oh, the adjournment should be during pleasure.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to speak on this motion, because it is not a mere motion for adjournment. I want to put on the record that this motion is a blackmailing tactic, in view of the fact that nobody is ready to speak now. We have exhausted all the items on the Order Paper and there is no reason for the adjournment of the Senate until 8 o'clock tonight. We could not do anything except with leave of the Senate at 8 o'clock, because, as I say, we have exhausted all the items except the one involving Senator Desruisseaux. If Senator Desruisseaux says he is prepared to speak now, I agree, but it is purely a matter of tactics on the part of the government. As far as I am concerned I am willing to come back at 8 o'clock, and if you are willing, all of you, to submit to that kind of way of dealing with the Senate, it is up to you. You can come and listen to a speech that you could have listened to this afternoon. If that is the way you want things to be done, let the motion carry.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition demonstrated earlier today his expertise in the area of blackmail. Earlier, a matter of some importance to this country was delayed by the Leader of the Opposition, and presumably by some of his colleagues. I refer to the consideration of interim supply.

It should be recalled that a full opportunity was accorded to honourable senators to attend meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to discuss the estimates on which the interim supply motion is based. Neither has there been any effort on the part of the government to withhold information, nor has there been any attempt to frustrate the established right of the Opposition to have information in this chamber. Yet we experienced the completely predictable delaying tactics by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, who gave us a demonstration this afternoon of what he considers the rules of the Senate to be.

Senator Flynn: What are you trying to do?

Senator Perrault: I want to tell the Leader of the Opposition that the proposal to meet this evening represents cognizance on the part of the government that towards the end of the week we may be extremely busy in this place, because we have a responsibility to this country to make sure this interim supply measure is given fair consideration and is dealt with properly by this house. We want to clear as many items as possible from the agenda so that we can get at this important business, which may take a considerable amount of time in view of the tactics employed by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Oh, please!

Senator Perrault: There is full intention on the part of this government to make sure that public business is dealt with expeditiously and fairly, and we are not going to yield to the procedural ploys of the Leader of the Opposition today.

I said earlier that it may well be necessary for the chamber to consider whether it wishes to meet on Saturday of this week, and possibly Monday and Tuesday next, if necessary. The government is fully prepared to do that if the public interest warrants it.

● (1540)

Senator Flynn: Why are we sitting tonight? The Honourable Leader of the Government did not say a word about that. Why? What he said was not relevant to the motion to adjourn to 8 o'clock.

Senator Perrault: If the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has listened carefully, he would know that I stated that we were going to deal with as many items as possible, and that it is Senator Desruisseaux's intention to speak this evening, which is a right he chooses to exercise and I give him full marks for it.

Senator Flynn: He was willing to speak this afternoon, and you know that very well.

Senator Perrault: I want to remind the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition that there is that matter of procedure, and that we have a committee on the Rules of the Senate sitting this afternoon. He is the one who has been making the case up to this time that unfortunately too many of the standing committees of the Senate are meeting while the house is sitting.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, before we resume other debates I want to clarify one point. First, I am at the disposal of the Senate, the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition as to when I make my speech. Is it material that I make it now, or make it later? I have received notice that the Rules Committee is sitting shortly after the Senate rises. My speech will take about one hour.

Senator Flynn: That gives you ample time to make it now.

Senator Desruisseaux: But, as I said, I am at the disposal of the Senate.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest, in order to give the honourable senator a fair hearing, because it is obvious that this is an important speech—important to all honourable senators no matter on which side of the house they sit—that it be made later this day.

Senator Argue: With respect, may I suggest that Senator Desruisseaux is likely to get a more attentive hearing now than he is likely to get at 8 o'clock.

Senator Langlois: But the Rules Committee is sitting.

Senator Argue: I am a member of the Rules Committee, and it was decided that we would meet this afternoon immediately upon the adjournment of the Senate. My wife and I had a conversation on the telephone, and I told her I might not be ready for dinner until after 6 o'clock because meetings of the Rules Committee have at times gone on after 6 o'clock. But I think Senator Desruisseaux's speech is likely to be very important, and I should think that it might be made now.

Senator Perrault: I think it might be appropriate to vote on the adjournment motion.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, we have had a debate on the motion to adjourn, which is unusual, and the motion now is to adjourn until 8 o'clock. I was surprised at the vehemence of the attack made by the Leader of the Government on the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Government appears to have forgotten that all the Leader of the Opposition was seeking to do was to have the Senate adhere to its rules. Surely when the Leader of the Opposition, for whom the rules are meant to be a protection, rises and asks that the rules of this place be obeyed, I suggest that he should not be subjected to the kind of attack made on him and the specific allegation against him personally of blackmail. Apart from the fact that the word is not considered appropriate for parliamentary usage—

Senator Perrault: I want to remind the honourable senator that the word "blackmail" was first employed by his leader, and admittedly it is unparliamentary for that word to be employed here.

Senator Grosart: If the Leader of the Government wishes to interrupt me again, I suggest that he should ask permission in the usual way, and keep that particular rule at least even if he does not intend to keep any others. If he had listened to me carefully he would have heard me refer to the use of the word "blackmail" as specifically directed to a senator. The Leader of the Opposition did not direct it to any senator. It was a general comment on the tactics from the other side. There is a vast difference between the two, and if the Leader of the Government looks up the authorities he will find that that distinction is made. My objection was that this was a personal accusation against the Leader of the Opposition of using blackmail. He did not make that accusation towards any individual senator.

Senator Langlois: Yes, he did.

Senator Grosart: We will see. My recollection is that he did not. He was not referring directly to any particular senator at the time.

Senator Langlois: You have a very accommodating memory.

Senator Grosart: Well, all our memories are accommodating; that is what they are for. They are intended to accommodate us in remembering what was said and in attempting to reproduce it. I do not see anything wrong in having an accommodating memory. In fact, I am glad I have one. Sometimes I wish the Deputy Leader of the Government had an accommodating memory himself.

Senator Perrault: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Opposition a question?

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator Perrault: This is the essence of the problem before the Senate. The Leader of the Opposition would like to have the question of interim supply referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. He states that there are certain questions which he would like to have asked at that committee meeting, and that he would like to have the Minister of Finance or his representative at that meeting. Now, we have in this house a rule—

Senator Grosart: Is this a speech?

Senator Perrault: May I ask my question? We have rule 67(h) which specifically states:

The Senate Committee on National Finance, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries—

And so on. If the Leader of the Opposition is so anxious to get this matter before the National Finance Committee, I invite him to make a motion in this house and have this house vote on the motion. But no, his proposal, in fact—and it is so obvious to all of us who occupy any section of the house—is that he wants to have the government make that motion. He wants us to bring the question of interim supply before the National Finance Committee. May I invite the Official Opposition at this point to advance a motion at the appropriate time to refer the matter of interim supply to the National Finance Committee. We can then vote on the matter in this chamber, and dispose of the question.

Senator Flynn: That question is directed to me?

Senator Perrault: It is directed to both the Deputy Leader and the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Grosart: I must say it is one of the most extraordinary interventions I have heard made on the excuse of asking a question. I remind the Leader of the Government that I rose only to protest the vehemence of the attack made on the Leader of the Opposition who asked nothing more—whatever the purpose may be—than that the Senate adhere to its rules in this specific matter.

Senator McDonald: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? To what rule are we referring?

Senator Grosart: The rule requiring two days' notice between first and second reading.

Senator McDonald: But leave can be asked, and you can give leave.

Senator Grosart: Yes, but the request for leave is a request to suspend the rule.

Senator McDonald: That is not very proper?

Senator Grosart: Of course it is, and it is equally proper for the Leader of the Opposition or anybody else to say, "I will not give leave to suspend the rule." I think it is about time we started keeping our rules here.

Senator McDonald: And nobody is arguing that. But now there is a proposal that this house should sit later this day. Let us get on with the question, and let us find out whether we are going to sit later this day or not. There is no rule that says we cannot sit later this day.

Senator Flynn: No, but this irrelevance was brought in by the Leader of the Government when he started to discuss the problem of the refusal to proceed with Bill C-62. That was the irrelevancy on the motion.

Since the Leader of the Government asked me the question as to why we do not put the motion to refer the bill to a committee, I say to the Leader of the Government that if he allows his supporters a free vote on that question, then I will do it. But if he is going to use once again the argument of Senator Langlois that it is contrary to our rules to refer an appropriation bill to the National Finance Committee, then I shall not make the motion. He is just saying, "Put your neck on the block and I will cut off your head."

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, may I ask those on the other side of the house, then, why they do not go to the Rules Committee that is going to meet this afternoon when the Senate rises, and have rule 67(h) changed in such a way that it will direct that these bills be referred to committee.

Senator Flynn: That is not the point.

Senator McDonald: It is the point.

Senator Flynn: It is not the point at all. The question is whether we want to come back tonight to listen to the speech to be given by Senator Desruisseaux rather than listening to it now. Even if we return tonight it will not change anything because the only thing we will be able to deal with will be the speech of Senator Desruisseaux, unless there is unanimous consent to suspend the rules and revert to the items that the Leader of the Government wanted the Senate to deal with today.

● (1550)

Senator Perrault: May I say to the honourable Leader of the Opposition that he is well aware, as are other senators, that the very essence of the problem is the interpretation of rule 67 (1)(h)—a rule, in fact, that is under consideration by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which is now urgently waiting to enter into its deliberations on the subject.

Senator Flynn: Well, put the motion.

Senator Perrault: Yet the Opposition leader suggests that instead we should have Senator Desruisseaux speak at the present time, indeed frustrating the attempts of the Rules Committee to meet to help clarify the meaning of the rule.

Senator Flynn: You have been a joker up to now.

Senator Grosart: Do you mean that the Rules Committee can change the rules?

Senator Flynn: That is a joke. You are not saying that seriously, are you?

Senator Perrault: I am very serious.

Senator Langlois: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure, to reconvene at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock tonight?

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this afternoon an important question relating to the federal excise tax on gasoline—

Senator Flynn: Order. I want to raise a point of order first.

Senator Perrault: I hope you have a point of order.

Senator Flynn: I think I have.

Honourable senators, I think the sitting of the Senate tonight is entirely out of order. Rule 45 of the Rules of the Senate provides:

(1) One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions . . .

(g) for an adjournment of the Senate, other than the ordinary daily adjournment under 46(r) or that under rules 13, 36(1), 46(f), 46(g).

[Senator Flynn.]

Honourable senators will remember that the motion was that the Senate do adjourn until later today—that is, until 8 o'clock—which is not an ordinary adjournment of the Senate and does not come under any of the other daily adjournments provided for here.

No leave was asked for; the motion was put without leave having been asked for. I think you will have to excuse us if we seem to detect a note of ingenuity on the part of the government leader or his deputy, but the fact is that one day's notice was required for that adjournment motion because it was not the ordinary adjournment of the Senate.

Let me refer you to the rules. Rule 46(r) says that no notice is required for the ordinary adjournment of the Senate at the close of the business of the day. That is the usual adjournment, but rule 13 states:

Unless otherwise ordered, when the Senate adjourns on Friday, it shall stand adjourned until the Monday following.

Obviously, that does not cover the present problem.

Rule 36(1) states:

When a question is under debate a motion shall not be received unless to amend it, to refer it to a committee, to postpone it to a certain day, for the previous question, or for the adjournment of the Senate.

That is, for the ordinary adjournment of the Senate. Obviously, again, that does not cover the motion which was put to the Senate this afternoon.

Rule 46(f) states that no notice is required "for the adjournment of the Senate, while a question is under discussion." There was no question under discussion at that time.

Finally, rule 46(g) states that no notice is required:

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a question of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day.

Under our rules, therefore, the motion which was put to the Senate this afternoon required one day's notice, without which it was entirely irregular unless it had the unanimous consent of the Senate. Unanimous consent was not asked for; therefore, unanimous consent was not given. Therefore, I state that the Senate is sitting irregularly.

Honourable senators may suggest that this is only a procedural problem, but one must realize that the Senate, as a rule, does not sit on Wednesday evenings. Consequently, there are honourable senators who, taking it for granted that the Senate would not be sitting tonight, are not here. Those senators should be aware of what transpires tonight. It is not only a question of listening to Senator Desruisseaux; there may be other questions put later on. Therefore, because of these special circumstances, I consider that the Senate is not sitting regularly, but is sitting illegally, and that the only motion that could be put at the time we adjourned was for an adjournment of the Senate until tomorrow morning at 2 o'clock.

● (2010)

Senator Perrault: Tomorrow morning at 2 o'clock?

Senator Flynn: Or tomorrow afternoon, if you prefer.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am speaking to the point of order. I find it is being raised belatedly, since it was not made this afternoon. If I recall correctly what my honourable friend on the other side said, it was that he agreed to the adjournment.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Langlois: You can say whatever you like. The record will speak for itself.

Senator Perrault: "It is all right with me," you said.

Senator Flynn: I said, "On division." I opposed the motion.

Senator Langlois: You did not raise the point of order then. You are doing it too late now. I should address myself to the Chair. I should not fall into this habit you have of speaking directly to individual senators. I am falling too easily into the bad example that you constantly give in this respect.

Madam Speaker, this matter should have been raised this afternoon. It was not raised, and the adjournment was quite in order. It was a normal adjournment. When the Senate adjourns in the afternoon, it adjourns for that day unless there is a special motion to meet at 8 o'clock, and then the next day it meets at 2 o'clock. The motion was to adjourn until 8 o'clock this evening.

There is another matter I wish to mention while I am speaking to the point of order. This afternoon my honourable friend was very critical of the fact that a very important question was put to the Leader of the Government in this house on the budget, and that there was no answer readily available. Tonight the Leader of the Government in the Senate is ready to answer this very important question that was raised by Senator Manning, and now the Leader of the Opposition objects. Where is the so-called urgency? Why did it exist this afternoon, but does not exist now?

Senator Flynn: I object—

Senator Langlois: You have had your turn to speak. Will you now let me speak?

Senator Flynn: You are not speaking on the point of order. What you are saying is irrelevant.

Senator Langlois: We have a Speaker here. Will you please address her?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Langlois: No?

Senator Flynn: In the Senate we do not address the Speaker, if my honourable friend wants to know. We address honourable senators.

Senator Langlois: As a group, not each one individually.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, at the end of the sitting this afternoon I said the following:

Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure, to reconvene at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock tonight?

It was therefore not a regular adjournment; it was only an adjournment during pleasure.

In my opinion this sitting is perfectly in order. We are now resuming this afternoon's sitting. It is not a distinct sitting.

Senator Flynn: Madam Speaker, I would have thought that you would permit honourable senators other than the deputy leader and myself to express their views on this. I think you are a little hasty in making a decision.

Senator Langlois: And you are a little hasty in getting up while Her Honour is speaking. You are not allowed to rise while Her Honour the Speaker is on her feet.

Senator Flynn: She had sat down.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is obvious that the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is in rather a testy mood this evening. May I suggest to him, however, that in speaking on behalf of his worthy group in this chamber he stated, just prior to the adjournment this afternoon, that he would be quite willing to hear the speech of Senator Desruisseaux this evening.

Senator Flynn: I said this afternoon.

Senator Perrault: It is a matter of the Hansard record of the proceedings of this chamber. There may have been an agonizing reappraisal on the part of the Leader of the Opposition over the dinner hour, but the point of the matter is that he did not register any objection at the time. Indeed, he gave every encouragement to Senator Desruisseaux to come this evening, and give what will be an important speech on certain fiscal and financial matters. While I hesitate to suggest it, it appears that this may almost be an attempt to frustrate the activities of this house.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on the point of order that has been raised by the Leader of the Opposition. The point is whether the Senate is properly constituted at this time. That, as I understand it, is the only question before us. The Leader of the Opposition has read rule 45, as follows:

(1) One day's notice shall be given—

That is imperative.

—of any of the following motions . . .

(g) for an adjournment of the Senate, other than the ordinary daily adjournment under 46(r)—

The Leader of the Opposition has also dealt with the other exceptions under rules 13, 36(1), 46(f) and 46(g), none of which obviously applies.

Thus, honourable senators, as I understand it, the only question before the Senate at the moment is whether we are properly constituted to sit at this time. It has been argued that the Leader of the Opposition did not on such and such an occasion object; that he encouraged this or that. I do not agree with those statements, but they are completely irrelevant anyway. It does not matter what the Leader of the Opposition did or did not agree to do. That is not the matter we are considering at this time. The matter now before us is strictly whether under our rules we are properly constituted to sit, and if we are not properly constituted to sit, we cannot deal with any business. Surely that is a matter that must be decided either by the Senate or, in the last analysis, by Her Honour the Speaker.

It seems to me that rule 45(1)(g) is as plain as words can be that there must be one day's notice for an adjournment of the Senate—and that was a motion for the Senate to adjourn until 8 o'clock—other than the ordinary daily adjournment under 46(r), which it was not; under rule 13, which it was not; under rule 36(1), which it was not; under rule 46(f) which it was not; or under rule 46(g), which it was not.

So, honourable senators, unless somebody can bring forward some information or some other rule which would properly constitute this particular sitting to do business, then I suggest we take some other measures to get ourselves out of this situation.

Senator Perrault: You are challenging the Speaker's ruling?

Senator Grosart: No, I am not, because the Speaker has not indicated a ruling. It would not be improper to challenge the ruling of the Speaker, but I am not doing that. I do not believe the Speaker made a ruling. Her Honour the Speaker began, and the Leader of the Opposition rose and suggested that there might be other honourable senators who wished to comment on the point of order, whereupon Madam Speaker quite properly resumed her seat and did not finish giving her ruling. My understanding of the situation is that Her Honour accepted the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition that there might be further discussion by other honourable senators on this point of order.

I regret some of the allegations that have been tossed back and forth in this matter, and I repeat what I said earlier, that as far as I know the only position being taken by us on this side, as expressed by the Leader of the Opposition, is that we would like to see in this case the Senate keeping its rules remembering, I hope, that generally speaking rules are made for the protection of minority groups. Otherwise as the great Edward Bok once said, every important breach of freedom, individual or collective, began with a breach of procedure.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I merely want to point out the problem that was raised, and that is that the adjournment until later this day is not provided for in the rules except in rule 45. I say that because rule 12 which deals with evening sittings says:

● (2020)

If, at six o'clock in the afternoon, the business be not concluded, the Speaker or the Chairman of the committee leaves the chair until eight o'clock—

There is no motion. The rule continues:

—the mace being left on or under the table, as the case may be: Provided that, if at the said time, a division has been ordered—

Which is not the case, of course.

—the Speaker or the chairman shall not leave the chair until such division has been taken and any formal business immediately consequent thereon has been completed.

So an adjournment during pleasure cannot take place unless there is unanimous consent, which unanimous consent was neither requested nor given.

[Senator Grosart.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Do other honourable senators wish to offer opinions on this subject?

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I was tempted to give my opinion, but I feel that I am involved in a different way and, therefore, I will make no comment. As far as I am concerned, as I said this afternoon, I am prepared to deliver my speech now, or when the time for it comes.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I respectfully suggest that when Her Honour the Speaker gives her ruling there be no further discussion, one way or the other.

Senator Flynn: No; we will move the adjournment of the Senate.

Senator Langlois: Is this a warning to your own side?

Senator Walker: Oh, no; I am just a friendly person.

Senator Perrault: We know that.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I was not here at the time of adjournment to hear whatever took place this afternoon. It might be proper at this time for Her Honour the Speaker to declare a five- or ten-minute recess in order that she may take cognizance of the situation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would honourable senators agree to this?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (2030)

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. Honourable senators, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of honourable senators on the point of order raised by the Honourable Senator Flynn. I would like to repeat what I said a few minutes ago regarding the nature of the adjournment this afternoon. This afternoon's adjournment was an adjournment during pleasure, which does not require unanimous consent, a majority vote being sufficient. When I asked before the adjournment, "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure?" the Leader of the Opposition said "On division," thereby acknowledging that unanimous consent was not required.

There are many precedents in this regard. This afternoon's adjournment was not a regular adjournment and rule 45, in my opinion, does not apply. It was merely an adjournment during pleasure. Therefore, I rule that the point of order is not well taken and that this evening's sitting is not irregular.

THE BUDGET

SPECIAL EXCISE TAX ON GASOLINE—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I asked for leave to revert to Question Period to answer a rather important question which was asked by Senator Manning earlier today.

While I am on my feet, may I express the hope that we can develop a new spirit of friendship and conciliation in the chamber after the rather difficult events of the day.

Senator Flynn: You do your share.

Senator Perrault: I will do my share.

At this afternoon's sitting of the Senate I was asked several questions by Senator Manning regarding the federal excise tax of 10 cents a gallon on gasoline to be used for private cars and other personal uses that was announced in the budget brought down last Monday night by the Minister of Finance, the Honourable John Turner.

Senator Manning asked at what point in the marketing process this excise tax becomes payable. I am informed that the tax will be payable by any manufacturer, producer, or importer of gasoline on all their sales of gasoline other than those made to other refiners. The manufacturer, producer or importer will pay the excise tax before it is sold by retailers to consumers. Refunds on gasoline purchases for exempt purposes, such as use in commercial, industrial, resource and government sectors, will be provided through a refund claim procedure to be supported by receipts submitted to the Department of National Revenue.

Senator Manning also asked for information regarding the precise time the excise tax would become payable at retail outlets. I am informed that all retail outlets selling gasoline at the pumps on a consignment basis were to collect the excise tax from customers on all sales after midnight Monday, June 23, 1975.

Those outlets which are called "manufacturers' outlets", or outlets which do not pay for gas deliveries—for example, wholesalers—must collect the tax from the same time budget night, and are responsible to make remittances thereof to the Department of National Revenue. Other gasoline outlets—for example, contract garages and owner-operated gas stations—which pay for their gas as received cannot raise their prices to reflect the excise tax of 10 cents a gallon until future deliveries begin at the refined price which includes the special excise tax at the refiner's level.

I trust that the foregoing information adequately answers the questions asked by Senator Manning.

THE ECONOMY

DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy.—
(Honourable Senator Carter).

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Desruisseaux is prepared to proceed, and I am willing to yield the floor to him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: On division.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, after hearing what has been said here today I feel that I may deceive you a little in what I have to say. However, I will do what I can in expressing my views on the speech of Senator Lamontagne and the important subject that he raised.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, let me say, first of all, that it is unfortunate that my intentions were misinterpreted on Tuesday, June 16, when I moved the adjournment of the debate following Senator Lamontagne's speech, though I took care to specify that I was doing so in case some other honourable senators wished to express their views before me. That outstanding speech on the state of the Canadian economy, because of its importance and timeliness, deserved well-prepared comments. To my mind, the two days of sittings preceding Mr. Turner's budget speech did not give us enough time to prepare ourselves.

It would have been most useful for the Senate had our colleague's excellent speech been delivered a few weeks earlier. This, of course, would have allowed more senators to express their views. The topic discussed by our colleague remains, nonetheless, very timely, and in fact goes way beyond the budget speech.

For my part, having had time to make a proper analysis of the views expressed by Senator Lamontagne, and having read the contents of the budget speech, I feel more at ease to speak intelligently and seriously on the matter.

It is a pleasurable and informative experience to hear an economist of Senator Lamontagne's experience and knowledge speak on the state of the Canadian economy.

In the vast world of economics, Senator Lamontagne belongs to a school of thought that is respected, in which he has considerable influence and has acquired an appreciable group of disciples. I congratulate him on his excellent speech.

[English]

At the outset, let me say now that I find myself in agreement with a good part of Senator Lamontagne's constructive economic views, especially inasmuch as I find they are meant to be applied to our economy now.

There is no necessity to restate, underline or discuss the historical Canadian economic background. Senator Lamontagne has been factual and thorough. I do not believe that his speech, important as it is and made just a few days before the Minister of Finance's speech, or the speeches of the other senators on this subject, in any way affected and changed the economic views of the Minister of Finance.

Almost everyone agrees that one of the most important economic areas to be considered in the next few years is that surrounding the problem of inflation. It has been the subject of a great many controversial views expressed in the last two years. Even the best of the world's economists have been unable to find a solution to this problem. Regardless of whether the country's economy is fully controlled, partly controlled or not controlled at all, the problem remains universal.

● (2040)

It is a fact that Canada has enjoyed over the last few years one of the lowest rates of inflation on record in the world. I would like with your permission, to place on Hansard, as though it had been read at this time, a recent comparative table of the inflation rate of 14 industrialized countries. This is taken from Les Affaires of May 26, 1975.

The figures speak for themselves, and need no further comment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the table be printed in Hansard at this point?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance consulted, in these recent months, Canadian leaders who are connected with labour and industry, and also the best economists and financial advisers. He also examined what has been done in other countries to fight inflation. The minister met, in most cases, with confused and varied economic views, and with controversial suggestions.

There was in Canada a general resistance, and even pressure, against restraints and economic controls of wages and prices from business, from labour, from an important school of government advisers and analysts, and from many reputable economists, although the OECD would have liked to have seen controls of wages and prices in Canada according to an article published in the Financial Times of June 23.

In evaluating these views, the Minister of Finance had an important advantage. He was in a strategic position with the international monetary policymakers who are trying to forge durable monetary rules for our nations. There should be less mistakes of the type mentioned by Senator Lamontagne made in Canada than elsewhere. Canada is now at another turning point of its economy and is now definitely moving into the economic recovery which Senator Lamontagne and the Honourable Mr.

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

Turner recognized, and which we already find under way in the European industrial countries.

I agree with Senator Lamontagne when he says that it is not the time in Canada to apply controls, voluntary or otherwise, on prices and wages. To me, controls in any form and at any time can only be used in cases of extreme emergency, such as in time of war when countries find themselves with closed frontiers. They have no place in our economy of the next few years, and I am glad the possibility of them here has been discarded for the time being.

In relation to the world economic situation, Canada's rate of growth in GNP was comparatively acceptable in 1974. In the first months of 1975, there were signs that its growth will continue, even though at an appreciably decreased rate. Most of the cyclical downturn took place earlier and more markedly in other countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and also more particularly in the United States, than in Canada. Canada felt the full effect of this large and rapid downturn. On the one hand Canadian exports declined while, on the other, Canadian foreign trade deficits rose sharply with all the attendant bad effects.

This severe deterioration in the foreign sector converted a last strong domestic demand into a much lower rate of growth in real gross national product. Prices rose in Canada just as they did in the OECD countries, but they did so at a slightly lower rate which spotlighted the inflation problem being experienced in Canada.

In my opinion, one nation alone—certainly not one of our scale of wealth and population—could never perform the miracles necessary to arrest a universal trend like the rate of growth of inflation. Canada could scarcely hope to achieve more in that respect than any of the countries behind the Iron Curtain, which are now going through the economic inflationary phases previously experienced by other countries.

I think it is valid for Canada to adopt the position that it is prudent to follow the present general universal inflationary economic trend, rather than to try going it alone, standing aloof or retaining a rigid, highly valued currency in a stagnant wage and price situation. The price of our trading goods must be met in terms of the inflated value of other currencies of the world, with a concomitant loss by them at the exchange level. In my opinion, that involves more a matter of balance than anything else, and I believe the Minister of Finance and the Cabinet generally have understood this, and have perceived it as a working mechanism, while seeing the value of striving to maintain an equilibrium which will pay off for Canada. In that respect I think more credit must be given to the Cabinet and the Minister of Finance than has been the case. Certainly, to my way of thinking the federal fiscal budget indicates just that. The budget is far from being dull and insignificant economically. On the contrary, I predict it will to an appreciable extent stimulate a much needed foreign trade.

In the face of the highly complex economic problems of today, I have nothing but respect and admiration for the Cabinet's recent economic achievements and economic planning, especially when I see in just what an economic mess the United States—with its artificial controls, its huge deficit financing and its superabundance of serious advisers and renowned economists—finds itself.

It is important to observe that, regardless of any policy-making decision, inflation does not change the real average standard of living in an economy which is working and producing to capacity. Prices may go up, yes, but, on average, there is a parallel rise in production and consumption per capita. Inflation may have the effect of redistributing income, but it does not change that average. Anything which gives one person more current consumption in a full economy must take it from someone else; in a depressed economy, that becomes simply destructive.

It is really a matter of factual observation, together with a logical economic deduction, that controls in themselves will cause real inflation. We have only to note what happened in the United States after the famous Phase II and Phase III periods. Obviously, controls lower total output, and employment disintegrates gradually as total output falls. Shortages are created because increased inventories bring about mismatches. These are the conclusions that I believe can be drawn from the economic premises that we now find before us. I believe we are now taking these facts into economic consideration in Canada. There is more wisdom apparent here than elsewhere.

● (2050)

Strikes generate real inflation. Strikes or work stoppages of any kind reduce the output available for consumption, and are now having far-reaching effects in our economy. Last year they were the highest ever on record in Canada, and they coincided with our rate of inflation. It is our duty to find the appropriate formula to do away with such work stoppages. Up to now, we have done too little, and have really avoided this problem. Our economists have not studied it enough as an influence on the general economy. Nowhere has the current deterioration in Canadian economic conditions been more severe than in the foreign trade sector. Nowhere else are the policy options involved in resolving these difficulties more awkward. I have spoken about this already in connection with Canadian textiles. I feel it must be studied in depth in relation to our economy, as it is a cause of many of our economic problems. In the first quarter of the year, Canada's deficit jumped to $1.5 billion, over $500 million higher than the previous quarter, constituting a trade deficit jump of 50 per cent.

Reductions in foreign trade decrease total output. All trade is based on obtaining something in return of greater value than the value of that which is sold. Foreign trade, therefore, increases the effective supplies obtainable with the available employment capacity, and reductions in foreign trade are, to Canadians, reductions in real value of employment. The federal fiscal policy is directed towards making our export prices more attractive to other nations. If this is successful, it will help.

If our goal is a higher standard of living, increased productivity is the price to be paid for it. Increased productivity requires added capital investment per capita. Increased capital investment pays off in more output. An economist with a lot of commonsense dryly explained, "No matter how we describe inflation, we can have no more than the total that we produce. Inflation is no more than an involuntary division of our common output, call it what you will." This makes sense.

As we look at the national income and expenditure accounts, we note the yearly progressive increases in federal, provincial and municipal government expenditures and their dramatic progressive increase as a percentage of the Canadian gross national product. This is an area in which most serious economists agree on the recommendations to be made to governments. Usually governments do not follow recommendations that they drastically cut their spending, which is agreed by all to be a major cause in this country of the increased rate of inflation.

In fact, government expenditures, which include current expenditures on goods and services and fixed expenditures, increased by 11.6 per cent in 1973 and 19.9 per cent in 1974. This coincided with the increases in our national inflation growth rate. The Minister of Finance is now announcing a cut in expenditures of $1 billion on a budget of $8 or $9 billion. It is a serious attempt to reduce the rate of inflation in Canada. It sets an example. If this policy is continued in the next two years, it will pay great dividends. However, if the overall deficit continues through this period to be high, the purpose of the exercise is defeated, and I am afraid this is now what is happening to Canada.

A surplus produced by increased taxation of the individual Canadian is less desirable, less economically productive, than a surplus produced by cutting government expenditures.

Professor Von Mises, a universally known economist, explains wisely that when countries committed to a program of economic planning are giving their people the illusion of prosperity at the price of liquidation of their money reserves, personal or corporate, such as Canada is now doing in the attempt to redistribute its wealth, then when these are exhausted a great catastrophe is inevitable. Our government is not listening to any such warning, I am afraid.

Professor Meltzer, another universally respected economist in his own field, in an interesting article on inflation published in Fortune a few months ago, wrote what I believe to be words of wisdom. He wrote:

The cost of getting back to price stability depends very much upon what we do to get there. People who talk about the very large costs of returning to price stability generally talk about returning quickly.

If we tried to end inflation quickly, we would have a major recession that would throw lots of people out of work and even so we would fail to get back to price stability because we would refuse to pay the cost in unemployment and lost production.

As economists with whom I agree see it, there is a wise, moderate and successful way to achieve a reasonable economic balance, especially in time of inflation. This is, first, to reduce the growth rate of the money supply gradually over a span of years—not the money supply per se but rather the growth rate of the money supply. Canada can do it with its monetary mechanism.

Secondly, it is to move from deficit to surplus planning in the federal fiscal policy. It has been tried, and it has worked very well every time. Any such surplus should then be used to retire some of this huge national debt. It releases money for new productive investments, and replaces very well other artificial money supplies.

Thirdly, it is most important to maintain our system of floating exchange rates. This makes sure that the unavoidable effects of the two elements on inflation are fully felt here, at home, instead of being offset by the policies of other countries. This is most important in our current economy.

It is my assessment that Canadian fiscal policies are now generally oriented toward these policies. They are bound to better assure the balanced economy we are looking for. It makes me more confident about the future than some of the confusing economic proposals we have heard as being the solution. To be sure, we can never be certain of the future. We are not alone in the world; we are interdependent. We cannot make certain economic moves without causing certain economic effects. We know, however, that no inflation has been ended in the past without there first being some reduction in the rate of growth of the money supply. We know we cannot maintain for long a low rate of growth of our inflation if we keep repeating our large annual government fiscal deficits. The next one is now forecasted at some $3.7 billion, I believe—our highest ever.

Senator Lamontagne has mentioned the major economic error now being committed in the United States regardless of a whole regiment of economic advisers. Whatever will be done it will, of course, affect the economy of Canada, because we are not and never were independent of the economic behaviour of the United States. We are highly dependent on their trade as 75 per cent of our manufactured goods that are exported are sold to the United States.

I want to say at this time that I believe strongly that there is no place for any form of controlled economy in Canada at any time that would place us "in line" with those other countries that have not the same economic needs or the same economic objectives as developing countries have, or as the more highly and more powerful industrialized countries have. I believe the free enterprise system has proven itself in Canada, and remains the best system for us in any circumstances. There is no better economic system for Canada. I am glad to see this is realized a little more by the government. I believe there is still a place for a basic change in federal fiscal policy—a real switch from deficit fiscal budgeting to surplus budgetings which can be used to retire some of our enormous national debt, thereby releasing money needed for higher productive financings that in turn would help to advance the Canadian economy to greater heights and greater world acceptability.

I believe there are economic basic reasons to consider another major economic problem that we have—to free Canadian labour unions from their international and foreign labour union ties. Foreign union policymakers who have been dictating their policies and enforcement formulas have never responded to true Canadian ideals. Their present policies have proven this so many times. We must require better accounting and better handling of union fees from all union executives. They should be made accountable and responsible. Free, secret, individual ballots on all and every issue should be mandatory in all cases. Forced, solicited proxies for votes should be assured full, untraceable, secret votes. No convicted criminal, blackmailer, arsonist, assaulter, user of violence, inciter to violence or treason, no gang rulers so feared by the workers, their families and their dependents, should at any time, directly or indirectly, be allowed to rule, lead, direct or dictate to any union or any union local, in any executive, consultative or other capacity.

Adequate legislation should be passed to improve the rules for collective bargaining so that it will no longer allow, as it does at present, long strikes that are costly for labour, industry and governments. The present rules are antiquated, erratic and economically ruinous for both sides. They are silly, unintelligent, confusing, unrealistic and irresponsible in the modern nation we claim to be.

Although I may differ from some, I think it is important for the progressive and healthy growth of the gross national product that the federal fiscal and administrative policies be so designed as to welcome really productive foreign investment from everywhere. There is an immense known forecasted gap which we must fill if we want to expand our economy. I think, particularly, that the money now being funnelled to the oil countries might well become, if we allow foreign investment for productive use in Canada, the money needed for the coming fantastic Canadian economic expansion that may eventually make our country a more independent, and a bigger and more serviceable, nation in the industrialized world.

I think it is urgent, and of national importance, that the federal authorities completely reassess their international trade policies in the light of what is happening to our secondary industries, and in particular to what is happening in textiles. The gradual destructiveness of some of our foreign trade policies to whole sectors of Canadian industrial life must be stopped.

While I agree generally with Senator Lamontagne's views I prefer, because of actual needs, to advocate a surplus fiscal budget that would release money to be used to reduce our national debt and create productive investment funds and more employment.

● (2110)

One of the most complex and acrobatic actions in these next few months will be that to re-establish and ensure a continuing and growing favourable international trade balance, while preserving from deterioration and misery Canadian secondary industries and Canadian employment, in an economy that may remain stagnant for some months to come.

Before concluding, I want to observe that, in my opinion, the Minister of Finance did the unavoidable in respect to the gasoline taxes he proposed. There was no alternative. In any event, and as was mentioned, in most countries the average price of the equivalent of a gallon of gas is now near $2. The new gasoline prices in Canada will still be comparable to American prevailing prices, and will be below those of most other countries. The move to impose the gasoline tax will be sure to cause new demands for increases in transport, bus, railway and air fares and a great many other costs connected with oil consumption—and this in spite of the fact the industries concerned are exempt from the tax. It may even start another round of inflation, and in that respect it is most unfortunate.

I have no intention of elaborating my general views on the federal fiscal budget at this time. I have observed the negative criticism made by some. I noted that no programmed economy budget which made commonsense has yet been proposed by anyone as a constructive substitute. The recognized militant economists have not come out with suggestions that are either clear or constructive.

I regret that the Minister of Finance did not find it possible to cut the fiscal budget to the point of its being a surplus budget, or at least a non-deficit budget, which would have done much for our fight against inflation. I assume that was an impossibility under present conditions. I reconcile myself to the neutral budget that he proposed as being the best that could be constructively considered in the circumstances. It was the prudent move to make for the next few months.

I thank Senator Lamontagne for his views on the state of the Canadian economy. His speech, in my opinion, was an excellent and worthwhile contribution.

On motion of Senator McDonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "LES BEAUX DIMANCHES"—REPORT OF

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

Wednesday, June 18, 1975.

Pursuant to the Senate order of reference, dated October 31, 1974, the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications reviewed the program entitled: "Un Show qui m'tente avec du Monde que j'aime" which was part of the television series entitled: "Les Beaux Dimanches", broadcast on April 28, 1974, on the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Order of reference:

"Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, October 31, 1974:

The Honourable Senator Langlois moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Denis, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the matter of the program entitled "Les Beaux Dimanches", televised on 28th April, 1974, on the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Robert Fortier,
Clerk of the Senate."

As it appears in the Debates of the Senate of October 31, 1974, the purpose of the motion concerning the order of reference was to use this program to allow for a review of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programming by the committee, as far as the achievement of the goals aimed at by the Broadcasting Act is concerned.

Your committee held two study sessions on the review of the said program, on November 28, 1974 and February 19, 1975. At the first sitting, Mr. Laurent Picard, President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Mr. Raymond David, Vice-President and General Manager, French Services Division were heard as witnesses. Also present at that sitting but not heard were: Mr. Ron C. Fraser, Vice-President, Corporate Affairs, Assistant to the President; Mr. Don MacPherson, Vice-President and General Manager, English Services Division; Mr. Pierre Desroches, Vice-President, Planning; Mr. Denis Harvey, Deputy Assistant General Manager, English Services Division; Mr. Jean-Marie Dugas, Director of French Television; Mr. Marc Thibault, Director of Information Programs, French Services Division; Mr. Jacques Alleyn, General Counsel.

During this sitting a videotape of the program was shown and a simultaneous translation of the sound track was provided for the benefit of the English-speaking senators.

Evidence given by the witnesses from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation revealed that the text of the program had been written by five authors. It was disclosed that the text of the program had not been submitted to either the programming branch or the officers of the Corporation for prior approval. The only evaluation made was by the Chief of the Variety Section of the Corporation. No evidence whatsoever was given that the Corporation had exercised any kind of control over the quality of the programming, despite the existence of a booklet entitled "Program Policy" prepared with the approval of the Board of Directors for the guidance of producers, journalists and senior officers. At the request of the members of the committee, the President of the Corporation made this booklet available to the committee.

Opinions were expressed by members of the committee that the program was in very bad taste, that the text contained several vulgar, offensive and ambiguous expressions and that the program was aimed at ridiculing the constitutional authority of the country. Further, it appeared that the program was aimed at destroying national unity by attempting to demonstrate alleged inequality of treatment between the diverse ethnic groups of the country. In reply, the witnesses from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation said that it was simply a satire that could lead to several interpretations but was altogether acceptable if judged in accordance with criteria established in other countries, namely, in Great Britain and France. The witnesses were reminded that the program had rather to be judged by taking into account the political context of Quebec, and that, in this context, the text according to some senators contained a separatist message.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation officers questioned the comments of some senators to the effect that the program contained a message in favour of separatism. However, it is well known that in several instances the producers or commentators of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation take undue advantage of their functions to propagate separatist ideas. Such an attitude has been denounced a number of times. For example, on April 1, 1975, Mr. Claude Ryan, in an editorial in the newspaper Le Devoir from Montreal, referred to the attitude of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation employees in the following terms:

[Translation]

"In other fields, namely in the broadcasting field, Ottawa has accustomed us for a long time to an entirely different approach; the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in particular, is an agency which comes under the authority of the central government. Yet separatism has not found in any other place as in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a better means of expressing itself as freely. Quite often—without anybody from Le Jour having expressed their astonishment about it—the impression has been created that the protagonists of this idea were more solidly entrenched in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation than its opponents. Numerous critics, scandalized by this fact, have, on several occasions, questioned if it is a normal situation that federal funds that support the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation could thus be used to destroy Confederation."

At the committee sitting on February 19, 1975, the only witness heard was Mr. Pierre Juneau, Chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission.

Questioned with respect to section 3 of the Broadcasting Act, which sets out the broadcasting policy for Canada, and section 16 of the Act, which describes the powers of the Commission, Mr. Juneau answered that the Commission, in a general manner, was vested with a regulating and supervisory power. He added that there seems to be in section 3 an insistence on the part of the legislator to make the licence owners and not the Canadian Radio-Television Commission bear the responsibility for individual programs—subject only to generally applicable statutes and regulations.

Mr. Juneau also mentioned Canadian Radio-Television Commission Regulation no. 5 which prohibits a station or a licence carrier from broadcasting:

- (a) anything contrary to law;
- (b) any abusive comment on any race, religion or creed;
- (c) any obscene, indecent or profane language;
- (d) any false or misleading news with the knowledge that it is false or misleading.

With respect to infringements of the regulations and related penalties, Mr. Juneau stated that as a first step legal action must be taken following any breach of the regulations. It is thus the courts that have the responsibility of determining the penalty. He added that when the Commission finds that the regulations have not been followed, the Commission notifies the station concerned, and if there is evidence of negligence or ill-will, it brings the matter before the courts.

To a question pertaining to subparagraph (b) of section 3 of the Act, Mr. Juneau answered: "I think that the intent of the Act was not that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission express a judgment on each of the radio and television programs in Canada." Later on, Mr. Juneau added that it would be contrary to the intent of the Act if a public or private network were to have a general editorial policy aimed at the destruction of national unity. He also stated, in response to a question, that, in his opinion, the best way to prevent abuses in the future, would be for the public to inform the Canadian Radio-Television Commission and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation authorities of its disapproval.

Referring to the matter of Canadian Radio-Television Commission intervention, a member of the committee asked the following question: "It has been suggested that over a long period of time there is an editorial thread that runs through the programming, particularly in Quebec, with the French network, that leans towards separatism. Where there is such a thread, are you dependent upon public complaint, or do you have any mechanism that monitors to check whether a particular station, a network, or any element of the broadcast media coming within your purview, is developing a trend of editorial approach that is contrary to the mandate for national unity?" In brief, Mr. Juneau answered in the following manner: "There is no such mechanism. We do not provide systematic supervision, if we mean by that that we would have to determine, through meticulous calculations, if not mathematical, whether there is an imbalance, whether greater importance is given to certain views to the detriment of diverging opinions." He added: "I do not mean by that that we should not do it".

Following this answer by Mr. Juneau, it was pointed out to him, that under the mandate of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, it was the Commission's duty to provide a certain degree of supervision, especially when national unity is at stake and that in such a case, it would be appropriate to set up a permanent mechanism to fill this gap:

It is clearly evident from Mr. Juneau's statement that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission does not exercise any direct supervision with respect to the quality of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or private station programs, insofar as the objectives set out in the Broadcasting Act and regulations are concerned. Moreover, Mr. Juneau admitted that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission was not equipped to supervise programs, and acts only after having received a complaint. It would appear that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission is thus restricting its supervisory function, by interpreting too narrowly paragraph (c) of section 3 of the Broadcasting Act which states that:

"(c) all persons licensed to carry on broadcasting undertakings have a responsibility for programs they broadcast but the right to freedom of expression and the right of persons to receive programs, subject only to generally applicable statutes and regulations, is unquestioned;"

Such an interpretation of the above paragraph is characterized by Mr. Juneau's opinion when he adds:

"The Act clearly states that in those areas there must be freedom of speech and, when established, freedom of speech inevitably implies abuses."

With regard to this attitude of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission it is well to note the following objectives listed in section 3 of the Broadcasting Act which provides for a broadcasting policy for Canada:

"It is hereby declared that:

- (a) broadcasting undertakings in Canada make use of radio frequencies that are public property and such undertakings constitute a single system, herein referred to as the Canadian broadcasting system, comprising public and private elements;
- (b) The Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural political, social and economic fabric of Canada;
- (c) all persons licensed to carry on broadcasting undertakings have a responsibility for programs they broadcast but the right to freedom of expression and the right of persons to receive programs, subject only to generally applicable statutes and regulations, is unquestioned;
- (d) the programming provided by the Canadian broadcasting system should be varied and comprehensive and should provide reasonable, balanced opportunity for the expression of differing views on matters of public concern, and the programming provided by each broadcaster should be of high standard, using predominantly Canadian creative and other resources;

(g) (iv) the national broadcasting service should contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity;

(j) the regulation and supervision of the Canadian broadcasting system should be flexible and readily adaptable to scientific and technical advances; and that the objectives of the broadcasting policy for Canada enunciated in this section can best be achieved by providing for the regulation and supervision of the Canadian broadcasting system by a single independent public authority."

The Canadian Radio-Television Commission was established by Part II of the Broadcasting Act and section 15 of the Act determines the objects of the Commission, which are to regulate and supervise all aspects of the Canadian broadcasting system with a view to implementing the broadcasting policy enunciated in section 3 of the Act. Part III of the Act provides for the establishment of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Section 39 sets out the objects and powers of the Corporation and subsection (1) states clearly that the Corporation was established "for the purpose of providing the national broadcasting service contemplated by section 3 of the Act." Subsection 39(3) states that the Corporation is bound by Parts I and II of the Act.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is absolutely bound to meet the objectives set out in section 3 of the Broadcasting Act for the implementation of the broadcasting policy of Canada.

CONCLUSIONS

1) The committee does not wish to pose as a censoring body of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programming. But, although the program under study may not contain sufficient elements to warrant a severe criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programming in general, this program belongs to a class that the Corporation should avoid presenting to the Canadian public. However, the committee was justified in availing itself of this opportunity to review the programming of the Corporation and the control exercised by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission with a view to meeting the objectives set out by the Broadcasting Act.

2) The committee wishes to point out to all those responsible for the administration of the Broadcasting Act that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is, under Section 39 of the Act, particularly responsible for providing the national broadcasting service contemplated in Section 3, which includes the obligation to "contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity." This obligation is not imposed on private stations. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation must not be placed on the same footing as the owners of stations in the private sector relative to this particular obligation, as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission seem to believe.

3) Considering the evidence obtained, the statutes and other texts studied, the committee believes that neither the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation nor the Canadian Radio-Television Commission is meeting entirely the objectives sought by the Broadcasting Act. It is imperative that these shortcomings be brought to the attention of the Ministers responsible for broadcasting in Canada and for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation respectively, as well as of the officers of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Deputy Chairman.

COMPETITION POLICY

SECOND INTERIM REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to table the second interim report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred, for examination and report, the subject matter of new proposals for competition policy in Canada, and for the consideration of any implementing legislation. I would ask that this second interim report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix p. 1135.)

Senator Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I should like to give a short explanation of what this second interim report does.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: The first interim report was tabled in this chamber on March 19. The committee has continued having sittings from time to time and has done a lot more work. In the course of this we had a submission from the International Air Transport Association, alphabetically referred to as IATA. It appears that Canada has entered into air travel agreements fixing safety rules and regulations, routes, tariffs and tolls with at least 19 other countries. While the original agreement is between two countries, when it comes to implementing the agreements that provide for the determination of tariffs and tolls through the Traffic Conference operated by IATA, the agreements are negotiated on behalf of, for instance, in Canada, Air Canada and CPA, and those agreements are negotiated with their corresponding bodies in the countries with whom Canada has these agreements.

When these agreements are negotiated by IATA it leads to a required filing of the schedule of tariffs and tolls with the Canadian Transport Commission, which has power to deal with those tariffs either by changing or substitution or fixing of tariffs, which tariffs then become effective. This appears to fly in the face of certain provisions in the Combines Investigation Act, particularly those dealing with criminal offences, which is Part V, and where agreements fixing prices constitute an offence.

● (1410)

Any interference with this ability to negotiate on a basis that the countries with which you are dealing can assume that such agreement is definite and certain and conclusive would interfere very much with Canada's trade and travel policies and arrangements. So, in the circumstances, your committee gave serious thought to the submission made to us. We concluded that it was not enough to let this question remain unanswered—as to whether such agreements would be in violation of the Combines Investigation Act—and let these agreements be able to be defended only on existing jurisprudence. We concluded that if there were any element of uncertainty—and we felt that there was—there should be specific provision by way of exemption, or that it should be a defence to any such prosecution that such agreements entered into in this fashion did not offend against any of the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. That is what this amendment is all about. We did not feel that it was adequate to leave any element of uncertainty, and so we propose an amendment along the lines I have indicated.

There is one thing that puzzles me. In 1970 the Parliament of Canada enacted a statute entitled the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, relating to freight rates to shippers, and so on, and exempting certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. The point is that at that time apparently no thought was given to providing exemption with respect to air travel of this nature. Obviously there must have been a large body of opinion in 1970 which concluded that an exemption was necessary for shipping conference practices as to rates, even before "services" had been added to the Combines Investigation Act, which at that time applied only to trade and industry. While we have jurisprudence on the subject, who can say that it is conclusive? Rather than face that consequence, and, recognizing the importance of this to Canada, we decided to recommend an amendment exempting, in effect, such agreements from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Hayden a question? First of all, I thank him for a very interesting explanation. Were the shipping conference agreements funnelled through an official regulatory body such as the IATA agreements were?

Senator Hayden: Yes.

Senator Grosart: Secondly, are there any exemptions to the general terms of the Combines Investigation Act other than the shipping conference, and now, presumably, IATA?

Senator Hayden: There is, presumably, the one which has been there all the time, that is, the labour unions. There is also the famous fishermen's exemption, and there are further ones that we have recommended. I cannot say they have the force of law yet, because the bill has not gone through the House of Commons.

Senator Grosart: Are lawyers exempt?

Senator Flynn: Not yet.

Senator Langlois: They should be.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I at this time ask the Leader of the Government or his deputy to tell us what it is expected the Senate will have to do for the remainder of this week and next week? The House of Commons will be debating Mr. Turner's most outstanding budget!

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before I give an outline of the work for today, I should like to ask leave of the Senate to have brought forward and placed on the Orders of the Day for this date Bill C-64 entitled, "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1976," which had been set down on the Orders of the Day for second reading tomorrow, Friday, June 27, 1975.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, despite the objections I placed on record yesterday, I wish to state that we on this side have no objection to giving leave for proceeding with this bill at this time. As the debate on this bill proceeds, I hope to make clear my reasons for this apparent reversal of position. I think you will find that I am justified in my stance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Hayden.]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should now like to inform the Senate of our program for this week. If it is the wish of the Senate, we intend to deal with Bill C-64 today, and to have third reading of Bill C-16. We should also like to dispose of Bill C-62, unless it is the desire of the Senate to refer that bill to a committee.

Once these matters have been disposed of today we plan to have royal assent at 9.45 this evening, after which we intend to adjourn until 8 p.m. on Tuesday, July 8. It is possible for us to have that adjournment in view of the fact, as I explained yesterday, that there is a six-day budget debate provided for in the other place. Moreover, they have planned in the other house to adjourn Monday and Tuesday of next week as well as the following Monday, July 7.

Senator Flynn: Is July 7 a national holiday?

Senator Langlois: No. As my honourable friend knows full well, it is because on that day an important political convention will take place for one of the opposition parties. In those circumstances it is not expected that any legislation will come to us from the other place before July 8. That is the reason why the Senate should, to my mind, adjourn until July 8.

Senator Flynn: On the whole it seems reasonable.

Senator Langlois: Thank you.

STATUTE LAW (STATUS OF WOMEN) AMENDMENT BILL, 1974

THIRD READING

Senator Goldenberg moved the third reading of Bill C-16, to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière), that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Bourget, that this bill be not now read the third time but that the French version of the bill be amended as follows:

● (1420)

Page 24: Strike out lines 14 to 17, inclusive, and substitute therefore the following:

[Translation]

"b) d'autres congés, pourvu que le total de ceux-ci et de ceux qui sont prévus à l'alinéa a) ne dépasse pas le maximum prévu aux sous-alinéas (1d)(i) ou (ii)."

Honourable senators, the purpose of this amendment is to make the French version agree with the English version.

The government meant to propose this amendment in committee, but since you have been kind enough not to refer this bill to a committee, I move the amendment. It is simply a matter of having the French version agree with the English one.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière), that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Denis, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., that the bill be not now read the third time but that the French version of the bill be amended as follows:

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I just wanted to say at this stage that it always seems important, as a general rule, to refer a bill to a committee. We should adopt that as a general rule.

However, in this case, I realize very well that the Senate can solve that problem. But there are other problems that can certainly be solved better in committee.

Senator Denis: Agreed.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the main motion, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT OLD AGE ASSISTANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Carter for second reading of Bill C-62, to amend the Old Age Security Act, to repeal the Old Age Assistance Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, yesterday the Honourable Senator Carter, in introducing Bill C-62, of which he gave a very interesting and detailed description, began in the usual manner by giving us a sort of monologue on the history of social legislation in Canada, or at least, the Liberal viewpoint on the history of social legislation.

Senator Flynn: What did you expect?

Senator Phillips: Senator Carter was not as biased in this respect as was the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his introduction of the bill in the other place, but, then, I know him too well to expect him to be that biased. However, if honourable senators are to continue this practice, I would ask that they make their monologues accurate and complete. We on this side follow them with a great deal of interest, but by now we know that there are certain periods in history which will be automatically skipped. We often wonder why you forget to mention the $6 in 1956. And whatever became of Mr. Harris? Then we wonder why you forget that it took a Conservative administration under John Diefenbaker to make the many improvements that were so badly needed in the social legislation of this country. Next time, honourable senators, would you please include some of these facts in your monologues?

This bill is necessary because the government has failed to control inflation. It is interesting to note that the cost of living has increased by 35 per cent in the last 40 months. It is even more interesting to note that we have had the same Minister of Finance for those 40 months. More and more Canadians, both above and below the so-called poverty line, are finding it increasingly difficult to meet the ever-increasing cost of living. Bill C-62 admits the existence of this problem, and attempts to provide relief or assistance for a small proportion of those in a particular situation—that is, where one partner to the marriage is in receipt of old age security and the other is not, is below the age of 65, is not employed and is unlikely to become employed.

This is not new legislation, honourable senators, but merely a marginal expansion of existing programs. Perhaps we could compare it to a traffic director in a city changing a "stop" sign to a "yield" sign. There are very few of our citizens who will benefit from this legislation. Of those in the particular age group who could benefit, I believe Senator Carter stated that only a very small proportion would receive assistance. Apparently the figure is somewhere in the vicinity of 10 to 12 per cent. It is estimated that there are 155,000 Canadians married to spouses over 65 years of age. Based on Health and Welfare figures for July, the spouse of the average pensioner receiving only old age security and no guaranteed income supplement would not qualify under Bill C-62. Therefore, 65,000 spouses out of 155,000 are automatically prevented from receiving benefits under this legislation. Approximately 62,000 spouses would receive partial benefits because one spouse or pensioner is receiving a partial guaranteed income supplement. They would probably receive an average amount of $31 per month, but the majority of the recipients would more likely receive $5 or $10 per month. This means that 27,000 spouses would receive in the vicinity of the maximum benefits under this measure.

The principle of universality has been abandoned, and a means test has been enshrined in the legislation. The benefits are on a reducing scale according to the outside income. This is the same principle as was established in respect of the guaranteed income supplement. However, in the case of the latter the reduction is at the rate of $1 for every $4 earned—in other words a reduction rate of 25 per cent. Under Bill C-62 the spouse's allowance will be reduced at the rate of 75 per cent, or $3 out for every $4 of combined income.

Honourable senators, it is difficult to understand why there should be such a difference in the two pieces of legislation. As I stated earlier, the allowance is reduced according to the income, and continues down to the huge amount of 34 cents per month. Imagine the utter delight, the joy in the household, when the cheque for 34 cents is received. The postmen who deliver these huge amounts will probably go home covered with lipstick from every grateful recipient in the country. Of course, there may be the advantage that they will make their deliveries a little more frequently.

Senator McDonald: It will keep them on their routes.

Senator Phillips: That is perhaps so, Senator McDonald. This reminds me of one of my favourite television programs, "The Jeffersons." As honourable senators know, when the Jeffersons received a slice of the pie they moved to a luxury high-rise apartment. I do not think we will see many people moving to luxury high-rise apartments as a result of receiving a cheque for 34 cents each month.

Senator Goldenberg: Will the honourable senator allow a question? Does he suggest that these women will be able to buy lipstick for 34 cents?

Senator Phillips: I certainly agree with Senator Goldenberg. I mentioned the inflation figures a while ago, and in view of them 34 cents would not even buy a lipstick today.

Senator Flynn: Those were the good old days.

Senator Phillips: The sponsor stated that one of the objectives of the bill, and the reason for introducing it separately from other legislation, is to promote efficiency in controlling the program. The honourable senator has spent a great deal of time on Parliament Hill—indeed, my objections need not be limited to this capital. The same situation occurs with respect to every program, whether it be federal, provincial or municipal. Once a new program is introduced a new bureaucracy is created, which keeps on growing and growing. In this case I do not think it will be too long before the expense of the bureaucracy will be more than the benefits paid to the recipients.

The government has made much of the fact that the so-called spouse's allowance will be issued in her own right. Honourable senators, how can we say a spouse's allowance is issued in her own right when the allowance is terminated upon the death of someone else? In International Women's Year, the government is essentially saying to the recipients of spouse's allowance that the allowance will be cancelled in the event of the death of their husbands. They will be told that they should have taken better care of them. Perhaps the doctors could not keep them alive but they should have done so, at least until they reached the age of 65 years, when they would have become persons in their own rights. I fail to see the rationale of lifting some poor individual part way out of a pit of financial difficulty, maybe for a period of two or three months and then, because the spouse dies, shoving them right back down in that pit. Senator Carter yesterday gave reasons why the act could not be amended, and those reasons were perfectly valid, but, honourable senators, the government did have the opportunity in the other place to correct this situation had they so wished.

The spouse cannot even make application in his or her own right, as both persons must sign the application. This raises an interesting question. What happens if one member of the marriage or the common-law arrangement is ill and unable to complete the application and make the necessary sworn document? The other partner could then be left in a sort of legislative limbo.

I am intrigued by the fact that a couple who face a barrier to marriage must live together for three years before they can qualify under this legislation, but those who are free to marry, with no reason why they cannot be married, are required only to present themselves as man and wife for a period of one year. I see no reason why two such couples should be treated differently.

On a lighter side, when I read the debates and committee reports of the other place I am intrigued by the statement that the couple must present themselves as man and wife for a period of one year, and cannot but wonder at what this involves. Do they go down to the mall and make a statement that for the purposes of Bill C-62 they are going to be man and wife for the required 12 months before they make the statutory declaration? This might be very good for the ice-cream vendors, but I think it would be rather difficult for the clergy.

Senator Grosart: It would put them out of work.

Senator Phillips: Another odd situation is that divorced or separated individuals may take up residence with another spouse without remarrying and can qualify for the allowance; but if for some reason, either religious or moral, a divorced person does not wish to take up a common-law arrangement, she cannot qualify for spouses's allowance. This is particularly true for those who follow the Roman Catholic faith. Unless they have changed some of their doctrine without consulting me about it, my understanding is that a Roman Catholic person who is divorced cannot remarry.

Senator Flynn: They cannot divorce.

Senator Phillips: Even if they are divorced, I understand there are still certain sacraments to which they are entitled. But if they remarry in order to qualify for this, or refuse to live under a common-law arrangement, they are discriminated against on a religious basis. To me that is clearly against the Bill of Rights.

This bill makes no provision for single, widowed or divorced persons between the ages of 60 and 64. That does not agree with the numerous statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that we are entering into an age of early retirement. I know that the sponsor of the bill held out a certain hope that those people would be looked after in future programs. But, honourable senators, there is no time limit given. We all know that wheels turn very slowly around this place, so let us not wait until the new bureaucracy being established under this legislation is retired before we correct this situation.

● (1440)

Earlier today, Senator Langlois suggested that perhaps this bill could receive third reading and royal assent later this day or tomorrow. As honourable senators are aware, cabinet ministers are avoiding Senate committee meetings these days. We had a good example of that yesterday. If the bill is referred to committee, I suppose the most we could expect as witnesses would be senior officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. We do not need statistical information. We require answers to political questions. Since we on this side are always cooperative and eager to assist the government—a government that needs assistance—we are quite willing to forego consideration of the bill in committee. That being so, the bill can receive royal assent either today or tomorrow.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I should like to welcome back Senator Phillips' participation in the debates of this House. I wish to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that in his absence his sense of humour has improved. Also, he has improved his skill and expertise and biased monologues of his own.

Senator Flynn: You would do well yourself.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that if Senator Carter speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I wish to express my thanks to my friend and colleague, Senator Phillips, for his intervention in this debate. I should like to deal briefly with two or three points he raised.

The first point, of course, is the very controversial point of universality versus selectivity. I think all honourable senators would be delighted if legislation of this sort could be applied on a universal basis. That wish has been expressed in resolutions contained in committee reports on many occasions. However, we are now reaching the point where there is some question as to whether the principle of universality in legislation of this type is really the best way of utilizing the financial resources of our country.

Senator Phillips also raised the matter of discrimination. He mentioned widows, single persons and divorced persons. His point with respect to discrimination is somewhat tied in with the question of universality. In legislation of this type, it is almost impossible to avoid discrimination of one sort or another. It is almost impossible to single out one group of people for special treatment without discriminating against some other group or groups. The only way to avoid discrimination is to apply the principle of universality. However, if we applied that principle, the cost would be somewhere between $1 billion and $1½ billion, and, in the light of the recent budget brought down in the other place, an extra $1 billion would be a heavy burden on our economy at this juncture.

If the principle of universality were applied, millionaires would receive exactly the same pension as those most in need, and the government would never receive back in taxes more than 45 per cent. In other words, if we were to expend a further $1 billion or $1½ billion in applying the principle of universality for pensions to people between the ages of 65 and 70, at least $400 million would be going to people who really do not need it. In the light of that, is it not better to be selective in directing this money to those who are really in need and who, without it, would suffer hardships?

I was in favour of the principle of universality for many years. However, my mind has been changed. As government expenditures become greater and greater and the burden on the economy increases, I, too, am led to wonder whether we can really afford the luxury of universality in legislation of this type. I would be happy if we could. However, since that is not the case, I think that the best application and use of our financial resources in this area is to apply them on a selective basis to those who are most in need.

Senator Phillips: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Carter: Certainly.

Senator Phillips: You mentioned that were the principle of universality applied, a great deal of money would go to those who do not need it. Applying that principle to this chamber, I point out that there are some extremely wealthy people, such as Senator Lafond, who really have no need for their salaries. However, the principle of universality is operative in this chamber and all senators receive the same salary.

Senator Carter: Senator Phillips also raised the question as to what happens if one member of a couple is unable to complete the joint application as required under the law. The answer is that there is a review board which has the expressed duty of reviewing questions of this kind. The review board will have the power to settle such cases on their merits. That is one of the reasons why we have the regulations and apparatus for review set forth in the bill.

Senator Phillips asked why a couple without legal barriers to marriage should have to live together only one year while a couple who have barriers to marriage have to live together three years before qualifying. I confess that that intrigued me too. It struck me on first glance that it should be the other way around, and that if no barrier existed to the couple getting married they should wait three years before qualifying, and that a one-year waiting period would be appropriate for couples who could not get married because of some legal barrier.

I made inquiries about that aspect of it, and I was told that the reason for the three-year rule in the case of a couple living together with barriers to marriage was that, in the case of one or both of the couple being married, there might be a legal spouse somewhere who, in the event of the recipient's death, might be entitled to survivor's benefits, and the three-year waiting period provides sufficient time for clearing up any legal complications of that kind. That may not be a very satisfactory answer, but that is the one I received.

● (1450)

I do not think there is much more I can add to what I have already said, except to point out that in a way this is transitional legislation, as the minister himself indicated in the other place, looking forward to a new system based on a guaranteed annual income, under which everybody will receive assistance as a matter of right.

Senator Phillips referred to the case where the spouse in respect of whom the allowance is paid dies and the other, being under 65, loses the allowance in consequence. This person then reverts to the same status as everybody else under 60 and can get assistance from provincial sources, which in some cases is even more generous than that paid under this legislation.

We are living in an imperfect world. We cannot have a perfect set-up. I think this legislation meets a need of a special group of those who are at present suffering hardship, and for that reason I hope this bill will receive second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Carter: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to add a few remarks to those we have heard from the sponsor of the bill, Senator Carter, and from my good friend Senator Phillips.

When this bill goes through I hope people will understand exactly what its purport is, and that women will not go overboard and say they are being discriminated against if they are not admitted to men's clubs. I have in mind an instance that occurred a few months ago. In Ottawa there are three men's clubs, the Rideau Club, the Laurentian Club and Le Cercle Universitaire, to which on certain days the ladies are admitted and welcomed, but on other days they are strictly men's clubs. Not long ago the three Ottawa newspapers cried, "Discrimination against the ladies." A woman reporter decided to interview somebody at the Laurentian Club, and when she went there she was told that it was not a day when the ladies were admitted. Up went the cry "Discrimination." The newspapers, who are always avid for news of that type, made an awful do about the whole thing. Surely there are still men's clubs.

Senator McDonald: And women's.

Senator Choquette: And women's clubs. There are still fishing clubs and hunting clubs for men. If these women say they are excluded because these are strictly men's clubs, I would like it to be clearly understood that this bill does not open to them the doors to all men's clubs.

There is one other thing that I should like to add in closing. If the ladies are admitted to their own clubs and if the men are admitted to their own clubs, then vive la différence.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE TO COMMONS

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Lamontagne:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to review and report upon matters bearing upon the development of the National Capital Region, including the programs and operations of the National Capital Commission;

[Senator Carter.]

That eight members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the said Special Joint Committee;

That the said committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; to report from time to time; to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate; and to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Honourable senators, I first wish to apologize for having omitted in my statement of the order of business for today this important motion, with which concurrence is sought this afternoon.

I do not think I need speak at any length on this motion, which was introduced in the other place on June 23 by the Honourable Barney Danson, who spoke of the importance of creating such a committee to study the possibility of creating a national capital, which will be the national capital of every Canadian no matter what their background, even though this national capital will be situated within the boundaries of only two provinces of Canada.

I believe that the Senate will be a very happy and worthy participant in the work of this committee, and that when the members are appointed care will be taken to see that every province of Canada is represented. It is important that all Canadians should have a feeling of being represented on this committee, because it is going to be, as I said, the capital region of all Canadians.

● (1500)

With this in mind, I commend this motion to your favourable consideration and, if it is passed, I hope that later today the party Whips will be able to get together and supply a list of names to serve on the committee so that it will be ready to proceed with its work.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, could I ask the sponsor of the motion if there is a particular reason why the committee seeks authority to adjourn from place to place? Is it the intention of this committee to move around the country and find the feeling of the people in other provinces about the national capital, or is this merely pro forma?

Senator Langlois: It is felt that there might be requests for the committee to visit some of the other provinces and get the opinion of local residents.

Senator Grosart: About Ottawa? It is dangerous. Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "LES BEAUX DIMANCHES"—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on the matter of the program entitled "Les beaux dimanches".—(Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C.).

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I understood that Senator Denis was proposing to speak before me. I have not very much to say about this, I must confess, which will be a relief to honourable senators, I know. They will also be glad to know that if I tend to become prolix, closure will be applied by the fact that I have to be at my committee on Statutory Instruments at half past three.

I also very much hope I may be able to get through what I have to say in time for the next order to come on, when I can move the adoption of the report of that Statutory Instruments Committee.

The report which has been laid before the Senate on the subject of the program "Les beaux dimanches" I think speaks for itself. It seems to me a very well considered and thorough report. I feel inclined to speak in a minor key on it, partly because after all it deals with something that has come on the French network of the CBC and it is a subject on which I feel that the French-speaking members of the Committee on Transport and Communications are better qualified to speak than any of us whose native language is English.

I think, however, there are some very important points which are dealt with here which are critical really for the whole functioning of the broadcasting system. I do not think that even if we have the misfortune not to speak French as our mother tongue we should necessarily keep quiet on that account.

As to the program, I am sorry to say that on the occasion on which the program was actually shown to the committee I was unavoidably absent. I think it was because of another committee. I cannot remember now the exact circumstances, but I know I could not be there. To some extent I am obliged to rely on the opinions of some of those who were there and saw the performance. I have read the evidence, but of course that is not quite the same thing as seeing the film itself. It is very difficult also to gather the full purport of the program from the English translation which was made of the sound track. So much depends on the idiom, so much depends on the precise phrasing, so much depends also on the actions which accompanied the particular things that were said. The language, after all, is supplemented by the actions, the gestures, the physical performance of the people who took part in the thing. We all know that it is perfectly possible to say something which on paper looks perfectly innocent and in fact by the way in which it was said, the tone, the gesture and so on, it is not innocent at all—and vice versa.

I remember when I was with the Canadian Labour Congress that sometimes when it was a question of alleged discrimination against people for union membership, employers would come forward and say "Well, we called a meeting of our employees and we said 'Does anybody here want to join the union?' and they all said 'No', or nobody spoke up."

Of course I am inclined to think on some occasions that probably what had taken place was that the employer called his meeting, looked around with a glowering expression and a ferocious frown and said "Does anybody here want to join a union?" Of course the answer to that was obvious but it looked quite innocent on paper. Similarly there may be things here which look quite innocent on paper, especially in the English translation, which in fact if you saw the program and if you were conversant with the French language and, I might add, the political context in Quebec, might look anything but innocent.

I think there is very little doubt, judging by what my French speaking colleagues have told me and by what I was able to gather myself, that in fact this program was of a very dubious kind, to say the least, and that it was likely to run counter to the whole purpose of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's mandate, or at least one of the main purposes, the promotion of national unity; that in fact in the context of political feeling in Quebec, a good deal of it might be regarded as outright separatist propaganda. That, however, I think, merely illustrated for the committee the fact that it became evident from the questions asked of the CBC senior people who came to us, that there was no adequate supervision either by the CBC itself or by the Canadian Radio Television Commission, of the kind of programs being shown.

I think this is a serious matter which should engage the attention of the Senate in the first place and of the corporation and of the Canadian Radio Television Commission in the second place.

One of the main purposes of the broadcasting system is expressly to promote national unity. If the Parliament of Canada thinks that is a wrong purpose or a mistaken purpose, they ought to change the act, but as long as the act remains there and as long as bodies have been set up to administer the act and carry it out, it seems to me they should make a much more serious effort than they appear to have made in connection with this program.

It is true that we may be accused in the committee of generalizing from a single program, but from what I have been able to gather this is by no means an isolated instance. There are other cases in which the same kind of thing, the same twist, the same tendentious kind of program has been presented.

Therefore, I have no hesitation at all in saying that I thoroughly support the report of the committee. I think there were even some members of the committee, I know there was one, who thought it might have been put in stronger terms. But I am inclined to think it is strong enough as it stands. I think it would not gain anything from any extra heat in wording. To my mind, it is a well thought out, well considered, well supported report on this particular program and on the implications which it appeared to members of the committee to have.

Honourable senators, I feel I have really painted the lily and gilded the refined gold of the committee's report, but I trust that I have at least expressed a feeling of one English-speaking member of the committee who was very gravely disquieted by this, and the more disquieted because of my own roots in Quebec and my long residence there, and my strong feeling for that province and for good relations between English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians and the maintenance of national unity.

I think it is no secret to honourable senators that I should not be sitting where I sit in this house were it not for my feeling that the promotion of national unity was safer in the hands of the present government than it would be in the hands of any alternative government. With that somewhat acid reflection—which I think will not endear me to the Leader of the Opposition or his colleagues—I take my seat.

● (1510)

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I will speak briefly. I think that since I suggested that a Senate committee should consider the matter, I must say a few words on the excellent work performed by the committee under the circumstances.

The report submitted to you is stamped with that restraint and discretion which is characteristic of the role of the Senate, the role of the house of sober second thought. I think that from that point of view, the report of the committee is absolutely unassailable. I know, as stated by the previous speaker, Senator Forsey, that some members of the committee wanted the report to be couched in stronger terms similar to those to which exception had been taken in the program. I do not think that a mistake can be amended by another mistake. In addition, I think that we maintained that degree of discretion and I hope that the CBC will profit by it in the future.

However, while referring to the restraint of language and the nature of the CBC programming, I wish to point out to the house two examples of recent CBC programs which were in extremely bad taste.

I refer to a program which I heard a few weeks ago, when a labour leader of my province, especially recognized for his Marxist ideas, appeared on a public opinion program where he could not refrain from using swear-words in every sentence. In my opinion, the CBC should not tolerate such programs, expressions of this kind. Further, one should not forget that the CBC has the duty to give the lead to the whole system in Canada, since it is the Crown corporation responsible for promoting national unity and reinforcing the country's culture. I know that the gentleman I referred to a moment ago does not represent Canada's culture on the whole.

Just a few days ago, on the night of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste celebrations, during the early part of a program which I found most interesting otherwise, some artists from the CBC and some from private stations used words absolutely offensive for the listeners. It was all the more regrettable, Madam Speaker, that some of these artists were of the feminine sex. I am all for women's liberation, but I do not believe that such liberation will be brought about by lowering women, by taking them off the pedestal on which we put them. I like a woman as long as she remains feminine. I believe most people share that opinion. Again I say that I do not believe that such a program as the one aired from Montreal on Saint-Jean-Baptiste night is within the category of programs that the CBC should finance and put on the air.

To me, the first part of the program to celebrate Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day was a glaring insult to the French-speaking people of Quebec. I also believe that first part spoiled a day which would have been magnificent otherwise and which until then had been a complete success. I am not alone in thinking that way, because I had the opportunity of discussing it with several of my fellow citizens from Quebec and it seems that opinion is widely held. That CBC program spoiled the evening of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste holiday, the joy of the festivities which until then had been a true success.

Now, to come back to the conclusions of the report, I must say I agree completely with the three conclusions contained in that document. The first deals with the CBC role and points out that the corporation must keep an eye on the quality of its programs. I also want to say that our committee was careful not to pose as a censor of CBC programs. Politicians, parliamentarians may be criticized for appointing themselves as judges of radio and television programs, of the quality of the private and public networks' production in our broadcasting system. But I submit, knowing that I am right, that it behooves us, it is our duty as parliamentarians, whether we sit in the Commons or in the Senate, to see to it that the objectives of the laws we pass are respected.

In this case, it was proved before the committee that neither the CBC nor the CRTC respect the objectives of the Broadcasting Act. It is our duty to ensure that the creatures born of the legislative authority of the Canadian government respect the objectives Parliament has set out for them.

As for the second conclusion of the report, I feel it is important to repeat that our committee insisted on the special obligation the CBC has of contributing to the development of our national unity and expressing the Canadian entity.

It is a far cry from this to the attitude some artists or producers of the CBC's French network seem to adopt when they use the airwaves, which belong to the public, when they use the corporation, which belongs to all Canadians, to destroy the Canadian federation.

In our report, we stressed the fact that the attitude of Radio-Canada had been denounced by some newspapers—for instance, in the article published by Le Devoir recently. I trust the authorities of Radio-Canada, as well as those who are responsible for the CRTC, will take into account the second recommendation of our committee.

First, let me mention the particular function of the CBC that is mentioned in the third conclusion of the report and that is, as I said earlier, to set the example for all broadcasting systems in Canada.

It could be argued, as some witnesses said before the committee, that the programs like the one under study are programs where satirizing is allowed and where we must follow—we were even given examples—the attitudes taken in other countries. We were given the example of the BBC in London and the ORTF in Paris. But I think that those two overseas broadcasting systems do not compare at all with the Canadian system, particularly the ORTF which is totally under political control.

What we have here is a state corporation whose mission is to promote national unity and reflect the Canadian entity. I do not believe that such terms of reference can be found among the objectives of the statute governing the CBC or the ORTF.

I fully endorse our committee's recommendations, when it insistently and particularly draws the attention of the ministers responsible for both organizations, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the CRTC, on the importance of acting with the utmost diligence to be sure that the objectives of the Broadcasting Act be respected.

Those comments end my remarks on this excellent report. I hope it will be taken into consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other honourable senators wish to participate in this debate, this order is considered as having been debated.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1975

SECOND READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved second reading of Bill C-64, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1976.

He said: Honourable senators, as you will recall, on March 26 last approval was given for the first interim supply bill for the fiscal year 1975-76. That bill, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1975, was based on the 1975-1976 main estimates, and provided $4,604 million for the expenditures for the months of April, May and June, 1975.

In addition to providing three twelfths of all of the items to be voted in these estimates, it also provided an additional eight-twelfths for vote L30 of the Agriculture Department, vote L50 of Energy, Mines and Resources, vote 20 of the Finance Department, and votes L75 and L100 of the Transport Department, for a total of $120,982,266.67.

It also provided for an additional five-twelfths of vote 10 of the Treasury Board, amounting to $20 million; an additional three-twelfths of votes 30 and 65 of Energy, Mines and Resources, vote 15 of Environment, vote 5 of the Privy Council, votes 40, 50 and L70 of Transport, and vote 10 of Urban Affairs, for a total of $449,223,250; an additional two-twelfths of vote 5 of Finance, vote L80 of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, vote 40 of National Health and Welfare, vote 10 of the Secretary of State, vote 5 of the Treasury Board, and vote 15 of Urban Affairs, for a total of $61,699,666.67.

Finally, it provided an additional one-twelfth of vote 30 of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, vote 1 of Labour, vote 10 of Manpower and Immigration, vote 15 of the Secretary of State, votes 1 and 15 of Supply and Services, and vote 1 of Veterans Affairs, for a total of $32,008,750, and for a grand total, as I previously stated, of $4,603,596,900.59.

I return now to the main estimates themselves, which were tabled in the Senate and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on February 20, 1975. Those estimates were discussed in committee on May 8, with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials in attendance.

The bill before us seeks no new additional borrowing authority but seeks the release of all remaining items in the main estimates for 1975-1976, amounting to $11,075 million.

I should add, for the information of honourable senators who are not too familiar with these bills, that Appropriation Act No. 1, 1975 covered supplementary estimates (D) for 1974-75, and was passed by this chamber earlier in the calendar year.

I commend this bill to the favourable consideration of the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I think I should like to begin by reviewing what happened yesterday, lest there be some misunderstanding of my position, or that of honourable senators sitting around me.

When Senator Langlois, the Deputy Leader, and the Leader of the Government, asked for leave yesterday to proceed with this bill, it was only normal that I should inquire as to what the program of the Senate would be for the remainder of this week and next week. As honourable senators know, the second reading of a bill, be it a supply bill or any other, requires two days' notice. Normally we should have proceeded with this bill tomorrow, if we decided to sit at that time, or next week. It could have been adopted in due course next week, and could have received royal assent, let us say, next Thursday, July 3. July 3 would not be too late for this supply bill, even if the interim supplies voted earlier covered only the period of the first three months of the fiscal year. A matter of three days would not have created any problem for the administration.

Of course, in the circumstances, since we do not have to sit next week, in view of the holiday—Confederation Day, Canada Day, Dominion Day, or whatever you like to call it; personally I like to call it Canada Day—

Senator Denis: As long as it is a holiday.

Senator Flynn: —we could very well have disposed of this bill by starting yesterday, and I do not see any problem in proceeding with it today.

The next thing I want to make very clear, before giving leave, is that certain questions which I and other senators wanted to ask could have been answered in committee.

This problem of referring a supply bill to committee has provoked considerable debate in the past. I understand the position of the government, that since the estimates are referred to the National Finance Committee there is not normally any need for the supply bill to be referred to the National Finance Committee. A supply bill does not need to be referred to the committee if the exercise is merely to repeat what the National Finance Committee may have done on the estimates themselves.

There are, however, at times problems related to the bill itself, as distinct from the estimates. In such circumstances I think it would be a worthwhile practice to refer the supply bill to a committee, and especially to the National Finance Committee, since that is the one to which such bills should be referred.

I have given examples of such problems on previous occasions, especially when there was borrowing power provided in the bill which had not been discussed at all by the National Finance Committee in its consideration of the estimates.

There are other problems also. This bill is standard, I agree, but a problem which I have always wondered about is the one which is to be found in clause 3(2), which says:

The provisions of each item in the Schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1975.

This is a standard clause, but I am not happy with it, because the National Finance Committee, in considering the estimates, cannot look into this. I have always wanted to know whether, by including a provision such as the one contained in clause 3(2), we were sanctioning expenses made by the government prior to the enactment of the supply bill. I say that because this is what it says:

● (1530)

The provisions of each item in the Schedule shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1975.

It appears as though we are legislating retroactively to cover expenditures made under this bill prior to its enactment. It is possible that there is a simple answer, and if there is then I would like to know it. I cannot see why the National Finance Committee would not try to solve this problem, and give me and other interested senators an explanation. I have mentioned just one example, but, honourable senators, there are many.

With respect to this particular bill, quite apart from clause 3(2), there is also the fact that it comes to us after the budget of June 23 which, in my view, is certainly related to the supply bill. But the budget was not considered by the National Finance Committee. I consider the budget to be directly related to the estimates, and I certainly would have had several questions to put to Mr. Turner either directly on this bill or on matters related to it. I shall return to that subject.

I want, first of all, to put to the Senate the suggestion that if the supply bill does not contain anything more for the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to study than what was in the estimates, then, of course, there is no need to refer the bill to committee. But if there is something else involved, then I do not see why we should be trapped by any rule that might say that no supply bill should ever be referred to a committee. I think it is a very bad principle and one we should do away with. I am not suggesting that this should be the way necessarily with every supply bill, but certainly it would be useful, at times, to have it apply to some of them.

[Senator Flynn.]

Having said that, honourable senators, let me go further and suggest that no one here would blame a person in my position for trying to use the occasion, as I did yesterday, to force, if possible, a favourable decision on the part of the government, or on the part of a majority in the Senate. I think nobody can blame me for trying to have the government leader or his deputy agree that on some occasions at least, and particularly on this occasion, such a bill could be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, particularly since under the present circumstances it would give members of the Senate and members of the committee an opportunity to question the Minister of Finance. And I am equally sure that today nobody will blame me for realizing, my endeavour of yesterday having failed, that it would be pointless to keep the Senate here indefinitely without hope of obtaining any useful result.

I think I have at all times been realistic in the positions I have taken in this place, and I think that I can fairly say that I have at all times tried to be cooperative. I do not think I have ever been obstructive for the sake of being obstructive. I realize that to be so on this occasion would be a useless exercise, since the minister cannot be available. However, I hope that the Leader of the Government or his deputy will tell me, will tell us, that there may be some future occasions when they will accept that a supply bill should be referred to the appropriate committee of the Senate in order that we may elicit some response to questions which we cannot really, in a practical and realistic fashion, elicit in a general debate on it.

Honourable senators, this bill, as was indicated by Senator Langlois who gave the excellent explanations that he usually gives on occasions such as this—and I congratulate him and thank him on behalf of the Senate—deals with the main estimates, the remainder of the estimates for the fiscal year 1975-76. These estimates have been considered by the National Finance Committee, and we have had a report which was tabled and discussed—briefly, perhaps, but nevertheless discussed—and they have been considered as much as it is possible for them to be considered in the Senate.

Let me point out that here I am not making any distinction between the Senate and the House of Commons because I think it becomes very difficult, as I have said before, really to keep control over government expenditures. I think that perhaps we should try some other method, preferably one that might be more effective than those presently in use.

At any rate, we have before us a bill which provides for estimates of over $11 billion in non-statutory expenditures. One of the items I was particularly anxious to discuss in committee was, of course, the statement made by the Minister of Finance on Monday last when he said that he intended to show restraint on the part of the government in order to indicate a line of conduct not only for the provinces but also for the private sector. I heard him on television—in French, by the way—and I was under the impression that the minister was in fact saying, “Well, the government is cutting its expenditures for the current fiscal year by $1 billion.” I think that is what was plainly said by the minister on television—in French. Then I looked at the text of the speech as it appears at page 7025 of the House of Commons Hansard, from which I quote the following:

The government has therefore decided upon a wide-ranging set of measures, covering our statutory as well as our non-statutory programs, budgetary as well as non-budgetary spending, our salary as well as our hiring policies. All are directed to bringing outlays under more effective control and to slowing down their rate of growth this year and into the future. Our target of cuts this fiscal year is $1 billion.

I should like to repeat the last sentence:

Our target of cuts this fiscal year is $1 billion.

Now, honourable senators, if you had heard the statement made on television, a statement similar to the one I have just read, then you would naturally think, I would suggest, that the estimates before us are too high, that the minister has decided not to spend the whole amount that is provided in the estimates and in the supply bill, and you would normally expect the minister to explain where in this bill there will be some cuts. We on this side would certainly appreciate, in any event, the minister's appearing before the committee and telling us how particular statements of his would affect this supply bill. However, we are left with nothing, because we do not have the opportunity of having the minister appear before the committee to tell us exactly what the situation is as far as this supply bill is concerned.

● (1540)

The explanations I was able to gather as far as these cuts totalling $1 billion are concerned are as follows. There is to be a $350 million reduction in Loans, Advances and Investments. However, two of the agencies from which funds are to be cut back, Petro-Canada and the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation, do not even exist yet. Then we have $350 million that probably cannot be found in either the estimates or this bill. In any event, do you not think that it would be more satisfactory to anyone sitting in this chamber, with the responsibility we individually have, to know exactly what is meant by this reduction of $350 million in Loans, Advances and Investments?

Of course, the same applies to the plan to reduce the rate of growth in the federal Public Service from 4.1 per cent to 3.1 per cent. What does that mean? Certainly in this supply bill or in the previous supply bill, there is provision for growth in the Public Service. If there is a reduction of 1 per cent, does it mean that we will spend less than is provided in this bill, or the previous supply bill which we passed at the beginning of the fiscal year? That, in my opinion, is a good question; that, in my opinion, is a fair question; that, in my opinion, is an important and necessary question for senators to put to the Minister of Finance himself before we approve this supply bill.

There are other similar items which are not too clear. However, I suggest that the budget speech of the Honourable Mr. Turner has a direct relationship to this supply bill. Other statements, of course, made in the budget speech may have only indirect relationship to the supply bill. They would, nevertheless, be relevant, pertinent and important, and I suggest that we are missing a good opportunity to clarify various parts of the minister's speech with regard to their effect on this supply bill by not having him appear before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. We cannot have him; and I am sorry about that. I will not keep the Senate here just to await the coming. We do not intend to stay here and do nothing.

However, I hope, and it is my wish and desire on behalf of the Senate—not on behalf of myself or the senators sitting around me—that the government will adopt a more flexible attitude with respect to supply bills. I hope it will ensure that these bills can be referred to committee when valid reasons for doing so exist. I say “valid reasons” in an objective manner, and I hope the government will consider these reasons in an objective way.

I recall that yesterday the Leader of the Government asked me why I did not make the motion to refer the bill to the committee. I have no objection, and I would like to take his words as having been pronounced in a sincere manner, that if I or anyone on this side were to move that the bill be referred to committee, the government would then consider the motion in an objective manner and not object on the ground that it is against our rules, which I do not accept. I would hope also that the motion would not be simply voted down without consideration, and then the argument made that a motion was made and the majority voted it down. That would be a mere pretense at democratic procedure. I am not going to make the motion today, because there are practical reasons why such a motion would not be accepted. Especially, I would not wish such a motion to be defeated for reasons which I do not accept, and which have been put forward on previous occasions. These include the reason that normally a supply bill should never be referred to a committee. I believe Senator Langlois will remember that on one occasion at least a supply bill was referred to committee, and he accepted the motion.

Senator Langlois: I made the motion.

Senator Flynn: Yes, Senator Langlois made the motion. So, assuming that the government intends to exhibit flexibility in this matter in the future, I will not make the motion today. However, I hope that I will receive assurance that there will be a more flexible attitude in future on the part of the government and of the majority. In my opinion, our attitude on this side is in the interest of the Senate, and is taken with a view to discharging our responsibility adequately. I hope that I have convinced the house, in any event, that under the circumstances of this particular bill it would have been very useful and responsible to have had it referred to committee in order to give us the opportunity to question the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the Leader of the Opposition for his splendid cooperation this afternoon, and his words of appreciation for the endeavours and efforts I put into attempting to explain, to the best of my ability, supply bills to this house. As for his comments with respect to the referral of supply bills to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I note that he referred to occasional referrals. In that respect I wish to say that I, on one occasion at least—if my memory serves me correctly, it was on February 22, 1973—moved a motion to refer a supply bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for the reason, and that reason alone, that I had been partly convinced by my honourable friend that there was a flaw in the wording of the bill.

I referred the bill to committee on the implicit understanding that we were not to duplicate or repeat the work that had already been carried out up to that time by the National Finance Committee to which the estimates had been referred. A representative of the Department of Justice appeared before the committee. He explained and convinced the committee that there was no error in the drafting of the bill. Although I made it clear, to my satisfaction at least, that that occasion was not to be considered a precedent, I realized and said that occasionally there may be reasons in favour of referring such bills to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, provided that this was not done for the sole purpose of merely rehashing the study which had been made by the committee of the estimates which form the basis of such bills.

The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon pointed out another occasion on which there might be sufficient ground for referring such bills to the National Finance Committee, when he mentioned the incident which took place about seven or eight months ago. On that occasion a bill came to us from the other place with a clause containing a borrowing authority. Objection was taken in the other place to the introduction of the bill, but it was too late; the bill had already been passed.

The objection was that the bill had been illegally passed because the message from His Excellency the Governor General recommending the bill to the house did not contain this very same borrowing authority. The Speaker of the House of Commons was placed in the position of saying, "That may be right, but the bill has passed; it has been referred to the other place, and there is nothing I can do at this stage" or words to that effect.

When that bill came here, I took the position—and I still believe I was right—that since this borrowing authority was not an appropriation, it did not need to be recommended to the other place in the message from His Excellency the Governor General. I was backed up in my position by an opinion obtained from the Department of Justice. However, this could be another occasion on which there might be some ground for referring the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

The other example given was where a fault or error in the wording of the bill is found after the bill has reached us. But, again, we must bear in mind the fact that in this house we are usually placed in a difficult position, which is not to be blamed on any senator. We are the victims, so to speak, of the rules and practice of the other place, which always sends these bills to us for consideration at the very last stage of a session, or on the eve of the deadline on which the estimates have to be voted. We are, therefore, caught with a bill, which deserves consideration, in the dying days of the session or a few days before the deadline for its adoption. We have to live with this situation.

[Senator Langlois.]

That is the reason why the practice of this house has been to refer the estimates, on which supply bills are based, to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for consideration well before the bill reaches us. I am safe in saying—and I am sure most senators will be in accord with what I am going to say—that the National Finance Committee has done a very good job in its study of the estimates.

For those reasons I would suggest to my honourable friend—I do not know if he will agree with me—that if at any time he considers there is reason to review the wording of a supply bill—for example, clause 3(2) of the present bill to which he drew our attention—and if there is any doubt about the wording of a bill, then that wording might be considered by the committee at any time during the session. We need not wait until a supply bill is before us to do that.

I suggest that paragraph (h) of rule 67 is broad enough to permit our doing that. That paragraph reads as follows:

The Senate Committee on National Finance, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to federal estimates generally, including:

- (i) national accounts and the report of the Auditor General;
- (ii) government finance.

That wording is broad enough to allow any member of this house to move a motion to that effect at any stage of the session.

The wording of these supply bills is constant. I do not think it has been changed since Confederation. If we have any doubt about the validity or the correctness of the wording of such bills, we can at any stage of the session refer the wording to the National Finance Committee for study, and the committee can call witnesses from the Department of Finance, the Department of Justice, the Treasury Board, or any other department, to explain why the bills are so worded.

Having in mind the considerations which I have just brought to the attention of honourable senators, I am ready to agree with the Leader of the Opposition and admit that on occasion—provided we are not doing it for the sole purpose of repeating or duplicating the work done by the National Finance Committee in its study of the estimates—such bills could be referred to the committee at times when the Senate is not caught with a deadline or the approaching end of a session, so that the committee would have ample time to consider possible errors or obtain clarification of the wording in a supply bill which is not too clear. I agree that each such motion should be considered on its merits. If I were convinced—as I was partially convinced in 1973, when I took upon myself the responsibility of moving such a motion—I would be the first to agree to it under similar circumstances.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Langlois: I move third reading now—with leave, of course.

Senator Flynn: I understand that arrangements have been made for royal assent if the bill receives third reading now.

Senator Langlois: Yes, at 5.45 this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order for July 8, 1975:

Consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Forsey).

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to ask to have the order for the consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was placed on the Orders of the Day for the next sitting, brought forward so that we can deal with it now.

I have spoken with the Leader of the Opposition and I understand he sees no difficulty. If the Leader of the Government or the Acting Leader of the Government also sees no difficulty, I very much hope that it may be possible for us to deal with it now.

It is simply a matter of arranging that during the summer we shall have a smaller quorum for the hearing of evidence, so that we can get on with the job and not find ourselves in the fall with a large backlog of material which has to be gone through. I feel confident that there will be no difficulty about this.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REPORT ADOPTED

Senator Forsey: I move that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

COMPETITION POLICY

SECOND INTERIM REPORT OF THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Thursday, June 26, 1975.

On October 16, 1974, the following order of reference was made by the Senate:

"That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon any bill relating to competition in Canada or to the Combines Investigation Act, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee."

Pursuant to the above order of reference, your committee now presents its Second Interim Report as follows:

Since your committee's Interim Report, dated March 18, 1975, on the subject-matter was tabled, it has been brought to its attention by the International Air Transport Association that the Canadian Government has entered into air transport agreements with the Governments of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Fiji, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, Peru, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States.

These agreements require, directly or indirectly, that airlines should reach agreements in respect of tariffs and, where possible, this should be done through the Traffic Conference system of the International Air Transport Association which was incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1945, and recently amended to enable charter carriers to be admitted to membership. The resulting agreements must be filed with the Canadian Transport Commission and the Commission has control over the tariffs resulting therefrom.

As Bill C-2 would extend the application of the Combines Investigation Act to "services", the making of such an agreement might constitute an offence under the Act, thereby jeopardizing the entire international air transport rate-making system which has been recognized by the Canadian Government up to now.

In your committee's opinion there is at least a reasonable doubt as to whether jurisprudence under the present provisions of the Combines Investigation Act holding that an industry whose activities are regulated by a government body are, to that extent, exempt from the application of the Act, would cover the position of Canadian air carriers. Your committee considers that the public can be better protected through regulation and control of air transportation matters by a single government agency and accordingly recommends that agreements affecting air transportation should be specifically exempted from the application of the Combines Investigation Act as amended by Bill C-2. The following is a suggested text of a provision to be inserted in the Act for this purpose:—

"4.3 This Act does not apply in respect of agreements or arrangements affecting air transportation reflected in any written contract filed with the Canadian Transport Commission pertaining to the pooling or apportioning of earnings, losses, traffic, service, or equipment, or to the establishment of transportation rates, fares, charges, or classifications, or for preserving and improving safety, economy and efficiency of operations, or for controlling, regulating, preventing or otherwise eliminating destructive, oppressive or wasteful competition or for regulating stops, schedules and character of service, or in respect of other co-operative working arrangements, including the collective selection and administration of agencies for the sale of air transportation."

Respectfully submitted.

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP SIXTEENTH MEETING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Sixteenth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Quebec City, 24th to 27th April, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, with your consent I should like this evening to make a report and then some general observation on the 16th Meeting of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group held in Quebec City, April 24 to 27, 1975.

As you know, it was in January 1959 that the former Governor General, the Right Honourable Roland Michener, who was Speaker of the House of Commons at the time, and Senator Aitken of Vermont launched the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group. Over the past 16 years the group has shown great ability in adapting itself to changing requirements on both sides of the border. During the last two years, for example, there has been a re-examination of the aims and objects of the group, and many important changes have been made. Today the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group offers an important means of direct communication between members of the Canadian Parliament and members of the United States Congress—an advantage few other countries enjoy. The group can be convened quickly, and used for dealing with special problems on either side of the border. Communication is the name of the game and, when matters get rough or serious problems arise, is it not better to be on good terms with our cousins and neighbours to the south than to worry about events in Outer Mongolia?

Since the setting up of the group in 1959, joint meetings have been held either once or twice a year depending on circumstances. However, no meeting was held in 1974, and this was due primarily to both federal and provincial elections taking place in Canada and to congressional elections and disturbing social matters taking place in the United States.

There was a general feeling among the members of the Canadian delegation to the last Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group meeting, in Washington in April 1973, that these interparliamentary meetings were not as effective as they should be, given the importance to Canada of her relationship to the United States. On the delegation's return, a study group was organized representing both the Senate and the House of Commons and all political parties. It met regularly over a period of many months, and formulated suggestions for reform of the Canadian section and for making the Inter-Parliamentary Group meetings more useful to both sides.

On March 20, 1974, at a general meeting of interested senators and members of Parliament, the study group, which was formed to re-assess the modus operandi of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, presented its proposals for reform. Those proposals, evolving from a series of study sessions, were designed to make more effective and useful the annual meetings of American and Canadian legislators. The report was submitted by Senator John Aird, Senator M. Grattan O'Leary, Mr. Andrew Brewin, M.P., Mr. Barnett Danson, M.P., and Mr. David MacDonald, M.P. A reorganization of the Canadian section was approved in open meeting, and I would like to explain briefly the main changes.

The Canadian section was established as a formal parliamentary association with elected officials. This replaced the earlier system whereby the Canadian delegation to these meetings was selected for the Inter-Parliamentary Group meeting on an ad hoc basis, with the Speakers of the Senate and the House of Commons serving as co-chairmen of the delegation. The Senate has acquired a new standing in the organization as it now contributes one-third of the budget of the Canadian section.

In the first election under the by-laws of the new association, Mr. Barnett Danson, M.P. and I were elected as Canadian co-chairmen, responsible for leading the delegation and also for the activities of the Canadian section between meetings. Due to the elevation of Mr. Danson to the ministry, the Honourable Martin O'Connell, P.C. was appointed in his place. Mr. O'Connell and I visited Washington in February to explain our proposals, which, of course, needed American consent—the group being a joint venture—and which were designed to make the meetings more effective. I am glad to say our American friends readily agreed to them all.

In order that the meetings should be better attended by busy legislators, we proposed to hold them away from the national capitals. Quebec City was chosen as the site of the meeting this year, and attendance at all meetings was excellent. We suggested that the meetings should begin on Thursday evening and run through to Sunday. This timetable involved only one working day, Friday, and thus limited the absence of American legislators from their country. This was particularly important for the Americans, who are under a great deal of stress and strain these days.

There was increased time spent on discussion in the meetings in Quebec, and a great deal of time was devoted to the meetings themselves. The discussion was conducted through three committees, each one of which focused on a separate area of policy. Canadian members of each committee received extensive background briefings and papers on the subject area in the weeks preceding the meeting. As a result we went to the meeting much better prepared for discussion than in previous years.

I have said we were much better prepared for discussion than in previous years. Taking into account the fact that delegates to the meetings were appointed much earlier than in previous years, the fact still remains that this better preparation was brought about by three groups, namely, the Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch, whose chief officer, as we all know, is Mr. Ian Imrie; the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Relations and Foreign Trade, which is operated by Mr. Peter Dobell, very capably assisted by Mrs. Carol Seaborn; and last, but by no means least, the several officers from the different departments of government, such as External Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and Environment. To all of these officials, we offer our most grateful thanks for their constant aid and assistance.

[Senator Macnaughton]

Coming back to the actual meetings in Quebec City, which were held in the Chateau Frontenac Hotel, the American delegation was led jointly by Senator Gale W. McGee of the State of Wyoming, and Congressman Thomas E. Morgan of the State of Pennsylvania. The names of the other senators and representatives are listed in the report which I propose tabling later this day.

The Canadian delegation was led jointly by myself and the Honourable Martin O'Connell, P.C., M.P. The other members of the Senate were the Honourable Paul Lafond, the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne, P.C., the Honourable Charles McElman, the Honourable George van Roggen, the Honourable L. P. Beaubien, the Honourable Jacques Flynn, P.C., the Honourable Josie Quart, and the Honourable Maurice Bourget, P.C. The Honourable Allister Grosart was prevented at the last moment from attending, which was regrettable in view of the amount of work and effort he had contributed in suggesting reform of the group during the previous months. The names of those members of the House of Commons on the delegation appear in the report.

May I say a few words about the plenary sessions? Delegates met for a short opening plenary session, the highlight of which was a welcome to Quebec from Mr. Harry Blank, M.L.A., Deputy President of the National Assembly of Quebec.

● (2020)

Following this they divided into three committees. They convened again in plenary session to hear reports from the three committees. At previous meetings in Washington and over subsequent weeks, an agenda for the discussions was worked out as follows:

Committee 1—Energy

Committee 2—Trans-border Problems

Committee 3—Trade, Investment and Economic Affairs

The committees met concurrently, each with an American and a Canadian co-chairman. Honourable Alvin Hamilton, M.P., and Senator Gale McGee were co-chairmen of the Committee on Energy, assisted by Senator van Roggen who, I am quite sure, will in due course give further details about this important topic.

Honourable Thomas E. Morgan and I were co-chairmen of the Committee on Trans-border Problems, and we were assisted by Senators Flynn, Lafond, McElman and Quart, of this chamber.

Honourable Martin O'Connell and Senator John C. Culver were co-chairmen of the Committee on Trade, Investment and Economic Affairs and they were assisted by Senators Lamontagne, P.C., and Beaubien, of this chamber. In addition, there were several topics which delegates wished to discuss which cut across committee topics. As a result, two breakfast meetings were organized, one to discuss trans-border broadcasting and the other to discuss defence production sharing within the European area of NATO.

It was decided that, unlike previous years when reports of discussions were worked out jointly in the form of a communiqué, this year each side would prepare its own report in considerable detail for each committee. I am sure senators will be interested to read the account of some of these discussions in the report I propose to table this evening.

Honourable senators will appreciate that social events can be very useful and rewarding in that they bring our delegates and their wives together on an informal and friendly basis. The American delegation and their wives were greeted on arrival at Quebec City airport by the Canadian co-chairmen, and then proceeded to the Chateau Frontenac. In the evening the Canadian co-hosts entertained the American delegation and their wives at an informal buffet dinner at the Chateau Frontenac.

On Friday, April 25, a luncheon was given for the delegates by the President of the Quebec Assemblée Nationale, the Honourable Jean-Noël Lavoie. It was held in the parliamentary dining room of the Assemblée Nationale, which had been reserved for the occasion. Some members of the Quebec cabinet were in attendance. That evening a reception was given by the United States Consul General in Quebec City, Mr. D. J. Corcoran. Later the delegates and their wives split into smaller groups to dine at some of the fine restaurants for which Quebec City is famous.

One of the features of the meeting was the attendance on the weekend of the Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Honourable James Jerome, and Mrs. Jerome. They actively entered into the proceedings, which was especially appreciated by the American delegates and their wives. Subsequently both honourable Speakers gave and presided over a dinner in honour of the American and Canadian delegates and their wives, following upon a reception in the Officers Mess at the Citadel, Quebec City's historic fortress. A final farewell brunch was held on Sunday morning, April 27, following which the delegates returned to their respective capitals.

As I have said, there were committees on: Energy; Trans-border Problems and Trade; Investment and Economic Affairs. I will not trespass upon the topics dealt with in committees 1 and 3, as there are other senators here who will probably wish to inform the Senate of the matters discussed. Insofar as committee No. 2, Trans-border Problems, is concerned, as co-chairman I should like to make just a few remarks.

The discussion in this committee dealt with the common law of the sea problems, fisheries issues, and the question of East Coast pollution, particularly in the context of tankers supplying Eastport, Maine, refineries through Head Harbour Passage in New Brunswick. Later, West Coast pollution from Alaskan oil into Puget Sound, and other trans-boundary issues including the Great Lakes, the Champlain-Richelieu Dam and the Garrison diversion project were considered.

The report which I propose to table later this evening goes into a fair amount of detail on these subjects, which should prove of interest to honourable senators. For example, with respect to the continental margin, which is the area extending from the 200-mile limit to the edge of the continental shelf, a Canadian delegate explained that Canada claimed ownership of this area but was prepared to institute a system of revenue-sharing of resources found there with developing countries. With regard to the exploitation of the deep-sea bed, a United States delegate said it should be a matter of first come, first served. The Canadian side suggested that an international sea-bed authority should be given a mix of licensing, contracting and exploitation rights. There would be some joint ventures by private enterprise with the authority.

Concerning fisheries, the position of the two countries was generally very close and their objectives were similar: the proper management and conservation of the living resources in their economic zones.

In our discussion of the Great Lakes issue, both sides agreed that the International Joint Commission was doing good work, particularly in regard to Great Lakes water quality, but in the opinion of the Americans it was over-worked, understaffed and took too long on its reports. In respect to coastal environmental concerns, there was considerable discussion of the proposed refinery at Eastport and of the West Coast problem of super-tankers traversing the Strait of Juan de Fuca to reach United States refineries in Puget Sound. Later, on the Eastport problem, Senator McElman was particularly knowledgeable and persuasive. Both sides expressed concern for the environmental risks involved.

There was a discussion about the Champlain-Richelieu Dam dispute; and on the Garrison diversion project the Canadian side made known its concern that the project seemed to be going ahead in North Dakota despite the frequently expressed concern of Canada that it would have considerable adverse effect, particularly in the Souris River and its tributaries. It was urged that a moratorium be declared on the project until a study of the impact could be made.

At the end of the meetings, members of both sides agreed it was useful and necessary in respect to matters of irritation between the two countries that each side should try to hear the viewpoint of the other side, that proceedings of parliamentary committees might be exchanged, that interested groups should be able to be heard in the other's legislative committees and that the channels of communication and consultation should be kept open.

Honourable senators, others will follow me, I hope, in giving details of their experience at this valuable encounter in Quebec City with our American friends.

It is my opinion that such exchanges between legislators are very valuable. But I might point out that there has been a recent development in the United States which makes it an even more important contact for Canada. In the past year there has been a shift of power in the United States from the Executive to the Congress. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs recently heard an expert American witness explain the new importance and power of Congress. Canada has only two regular contacts with congressional figures—an arm's length contact through our embassy in Washington, and these Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group meetings. It is my opinion that these meetings can be a major link between Canada and the United States and an important way for Canadians to influence American decision-makers. There is no doubt that the Quebec meeting has shown us new possibilities of increasing still further the effectiveness of this contact.

● (2030)

At the fifteenth meeting of the group held in Washington on April 5, 1973, Deputy Secretary of State, Kenneth B. Rush, addressed a plenary session and, in part, spoke as follows:

Our examination together of these issues inevitably reflects the long history of our unique relationship. I know that many words have been devoted to semantic discussions of "the special relationship" between us—what it is, whether it exists, and so forth. I do not propose to add to the debate on this question. I would merely assert that it is abundantly clear that geography has placed us next to each other, that through decades of history we have lived side by side in peace and friendship, and that we share a common set of basic values.

He went on to say:

I am conscious that particular problems may be very much on your minds at the moment. We have unresolved trade issues between us. I know that there is genuine and widespread concern in Canada over the role of private American investment there. It will not be easy to find equitable and mutually satisfactory solutions to cross-border energy problems. We have both recognized belatedly that we share serious environmental problems.

As we approach discussions of these issues, however, I trust none of us will lose sight of the long and remarkable record we have of together finding solutions. Some of them have become routine and are taken for granted. Some have required patient negotiation and imaginative genius. Many were unprecedented in their time.

It seems to me the key to solution of our common problems is the spirit in which we approach them. Let us be mindful of the benefits our proximity brings us both; let us never forget that we are sovereign and independent nations; let us be patient when necessary; let us be respectful of our unsurpassed record of resolving differences; and let us never cease to attempt to understand each other's viewpoint.

In conclusion, on April 15, 1975, the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, on foreign policy, wrote:

There is no such thing any more as a totally independent country, and there is no such thing as a distinctive and unrelated problem. All human beings in one measure or another are interdependent, and all human problems are interrelated. Not just in theory or in textbook explanations but in actual, daily application.

The importance of maintaining cordial, beneficial relations with the United States of America is one of the great objectives of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I now table the report of the sixteenth meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held in Quebec City, April 24 to 27, 1975, and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

[Senator Macnaughton]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A" pp. 1144-1155.)

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, in following Senator Macnaughton, I should like to take a few moments of your time in reporting on one particular committee of the three mentioned by him that were structured at Quebec City, namely, the Committee on Energy.

Before doing so, however, I congratulate Senator Macnaughton and the other American-Canadian co-chairmen for the work they have done during the past year in giving new life to the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group.

The majority of the American delegates at Quebec City were outspoken in their praise of the work done, particularly by the Canadian co-chairmen, in launching the Inter-Parliamentary Group on what they felt would be an increasingly important path in the years to come. Many of them referred to this particular meeting as the best for many years. Certainly credit for that goes to Senator Macnaughton and his co-chairman for the work done prior to the meeting relating to the agenda and other arrangements.

It is difficult to deal with the subject of Canada-U.S. energy problems without putting them in the broader context of the so-called energy crisis in general which the world has faced in the past two or three years, primarily as a result of the actions of the OPEC countries. If I may, I should like to refer briefly to a speech I gave on Canada-United States relations at Quebec City, a few weeks after the meeting with which we are concerned. In that speech I said:

It is popular today to speak of the energy crisis, but I prefer to speak in terms of the crisis in cheap energy, because in my view there is no shortage of energy in the world—the whole universe is energy—there is only a crisis as a result of having obtained our oil and natural gas, on which our economies are so dependent, at a fraction of their true value for so many years that our economies became badly distorted.

There are proven reserves of oil in the world for 30 or 40 years and new conventional oil will be found for a further number of years supply. If we add to this the nonconventional oil reserves such as our Athabasca Tar Sands and your Colorado Oil Shale, to say nothing of converting coal, we have ample conventional fuel to bridge the period through fission cheap hydrogen and on to the harnessing of the fusion process the ultimate energy source.

I went on to say:

By the way, I would suggest that you not hold your breath while our oil needs are supplied from the Athabasca Tar Sands or the Colorado Oil Shale, as my personal view is that these sources will prove to be so expensive that they will not be competitive in this generation. We must first look to new conventional reserves of oil and gas and to the conversion of coal.

Against that background of the problem of energy generally, which I believe other people on that committee agreed with in principle, we discussed the particular problems of energy vis-à-vis the United States and Canada.

Again, if I may, I should like to quote from that same speech, as follows:

Our problem in North America is a short range one involving the problem of bridging the gap until you— That is, the United States.

can bring on stream your oil and gas from Alaska and we can bring on stream our Arctic gas, which is now fairly well proven, and develop Arctic and offshore oil, where our preliminary showings are hopeful but where supplies are not yet proven. This will take varying lengths of time and huge amounts of capital during the next ten years.

So we have, insofar as our interrelationship with the United States in the narrow field of energy is concerned, basically a short range problem. In dealing with it, I will break energy down into five categories, namely, oil, gas, coal, nuclear energy in all its forms, and exotic types of solutions to the problem.

Insofar as oil is concerned, we have at present in Canada proven supplies for a period which is estimated in the area of eight years. With respect to the figures I am about to give I would stress that different experts give different estimates. They are ballpark figures, and should be treated as such. Similarly, the United States has conventional supplies proven at home for a short period of time. When you think of the total dependence we have on oil—so much of our industry and transportation, of course, being based on oil—eight to ten years' supply is anything but a sanguine thought.

To put in perspective the types of problems of bringing on new supplies of oil, I would quote amounts such as approximately $1,000 per barrel-day to produce oil in the Near East, and roughly $4,000 per barrel-day in Alberta. Those amounts can be escalated to $10,000 to $15,000 in our Arctic and in the North Sea, and there are estimates that go as high as $20,000 for developing the Athabasca tar sands. You can see the great need in both of our countries, and in the world generally, to bring the value of oil up to world prices as soon as is reasonably possible without disrupting the economy too badly, so as to create an ability in ourselves to bring on stream these frontier oil reserves.

● (2040)

The United States has in Alaska unquestionably a very huge pool of oil. They will talk in terms of as little as ten billion barrels, because they actually have proven to the satisfaction of the banks a sufficient number of barrels to warrant financing the oil pipeline being built across Alaska today. However, knowledgeable people in the industry are convinced that Alaska has very much larger reserves of oil than that; some people have estimated it as running to 100 billion barrels, and others compare it to Arabia. Once that oil is brought down to the lower 48 states, the American problem will be greatly resolved. It will take yet two or three years until the first pipeline is completed, and because that will not solve all their problems they will still be needing to develop their coal and nuclear energy sources, as well as continuing to import substantial amounts of their oil from overseas. However, they hope to keep that figure at a level whereby they will not be completely crippled if it is cut off.

In Canada we have the same shortage facing us in eight or ten years, but our problem is a little more serious than theirs in that, while we have discovered substantial natural gas in the Arctic and in the Mackenzie Basin, we have yet to discover proven reserves of oil in sufficient quantities in our Arctic and offshore. We have very hopeful signs, but it is not yet proven, and we have not yet contemplated building an oil line from our Arctic because the oil is not yet discovered, so we are not in as sanguine a position as that of the United States.

I should sound a warning at this point. Canadians should not be too quick to suggest that we should play dog in the manger with our American friends on matters of energy, because that may be a very shortsighted point of view in the long haul. We may well be looking to assistance from our American friends on the short haul in the years to come, as they might look to us for assistance from time to time today.

With respect to nonconventional oil, namely, the Athabasca tar sands and the Colorado oil shale, I said a few moments ago that estimates of the Athabasca tar sands recovery indicate costs that will run to possibly $20 a barrel. It may very well not be competitive, and we must not tie our industrial machine to the hope of that being a total solution, without seeking conventional sources in our Arctic and elsewhere. I do not quarrel with the decision of the Ontario government, the Alberta government and the Canadian government to spend money in pursuing development of the tar sands. I think we must develop our technology if we are to be ready when the time comes, but that time may be some distance off as yet.

So, honourable senators, our oil problem is similar to that of the United States. We have a short-term problem looming in the near future until, first, they can get their Alaska oil down, and, secondly, we can develop some Arctic conventional oil or offshore conventional oil.

With natural gas there is a more serious problem. Natural gas is not as readily transported across oceans as is oil, although progress is being made in cryogenic tankers, and our natural gas supplies indicate that we will be in short supply. I do not see us being able to meet our commitments in only three years in Canada. The United States imports a substantial amount of natural gas from Canada and, unlike oil, it is imported on long-term contracts for 20 years, most of them with another 15 or 18 years to go.

You will hear Americans complain bitterly, as did some members of the American delegation on my committee, that we have not been honouring these contracts in raising the price of the gas very, very substantially. I took issue with them on this, and I take issue with others who say that, because in my opinion the increases in price have been done entirely legally under these contracts, if you look at the export licences of the National Energy Board under which contracts were renegotiated as recently as 1970. I will not go into that in detail tonight. I had detailed information at my fingertips for the committee on this subject, given to me, by the way, not only by Ottawa officials but by senior officials of the major exporting company in Western Canada, Westcoast Transmission.

A more serious problem, however, involves, not the increase in price of our gas to the Americans but the existing shortfall in our quantity delivery and the potentially greater shortfall in the quantity delivered in the next few years. The existing shortfall through the West-coast Transmission system ran as high as 25 per cent average during the last two winters, which were mild, and at peak periods as high as 50 per cent. This was created by a certain phenomena of water in the wells in Northern British Columbia, which is not a curable problem. In the future a simple shortage of gas from existing fields will put us and Canadian governments in a position of choosing between honouring export contracts or seeing Canadians suffer from a lack of gas supply. This will be a very difficult thing for Canadian governments to cope with and, in my judgment, might well produce the most difficult irritant or problem between Canada and the United States in the next three or four years.

Here again, looking at the Canadian scene, we have not yet made decisions as to the pipelines that are to be built to bring down our Arctic gas to alleviate this problem. Here we are in approximately the same position as the United States, because the question has yet to be resolved by them as to whether they will bring their gas out of Alaska by pipeline across Alaska, then freeze it and take it down the West Coast by tanker, or whether they will opt for the Mackenzie Valley pipeline through Canada—if indeed Canada will agree to construct such a line.

Canadians, on the other hand, have yet to determine whether they would rather have the Alaska Valley pipeline carry both Alaskan gas and Mackenzie Delta gas, to serve both the United States and Canada, or build only a Canadian facility. The regulatory bodies in Ottawa and Washington will be at least two years in making the decision on these important questions, and then there will be two, or three years, or more, needed for construction. So, it is clear that we will not have this problem solved at the time the actual shortfall will start to occur in the next two or three years. This can be a serious irritant between our two countries until the Alaska and Arctic gas is brought on stream, and we must move to bring it on stream as rapidly as possible.

Honourable senators, with respect to coal I can only say to those doubters and others who think we are going to be short of energy and will have to leave our cars in the garage for all time to come, that we are particularly fortunate in both the United States and Canada in having some of the world's greatest coal reserves. We have huge reserves in Canada, and the United States has coal reserves that I believe equal something approaching 20 or 25 per cent of the world's total known supplies.

So, there is no total energy shortage. There is a shortage of available, cheap, convenient energy. But when you get oil at $10 or $12 a barrel, the conversion of coal starts to become very possible. The technology is known. Coal can be converted to gas, to oil, and to feedstocks for petrochemicals. Indeed, any greenery that grows in the field can be converted to any of those substances. We will not be out of our basic requirements, as long as the price is sufficient to encourage people to bring along alternative sources.

[Senator van Roggen.]

Honourable senators, I saw a graph the other day of anticipated United States energy provisions by the year 2000, and all of these forms of energy are still being used—oil and gas, less than today in total percentages but still significant; coal, probably twice as much as today; nuclear energy, two or three times as much as today; exotic fuels, which I will come to in a minute or two, not a significant amount. So this is a thing that will change slowly.

Honourable senators, coming back to Canada-United States relations—which is what I am addressing myself to—there is no particular problem between Canada and the United States insofar as coal is concerned, again with the exception of the short term. Some Americans, including one or two people at the committee hearing, made reference to the fact that Ontario's industries survive in large measure on the importation of American coal. This is true for both generating plants and steel mills in Ontario.

The inference has been drawn that if we cut off their oil by diminishing our exports, they will have to divert that coal to Montana and the northern tier states. This would be a counterproductive tit-for-tat approach to a problem, because much of the energy generated from that coal in Ontario is in turn shipped back to the United States in the form of electrical energy. And, by the same token, if we are not generating that energy with coal in Ontario we would have no choice but to divert Quebec hydro from the northeast United States into Ontario. I think our friends readily recognized that what we need to do is cooperate in these things and not visualize tit-for-tat restrictions against one another.

Honourable senators, I am moving ahead quickly because I believe there are others who wish to speak this evening. On nuclear energy, I can say that I believe both countries are now in a position where we are developing our nuclear capacity in a constant fashion. I think we may soon move to cheap hydrogen, about which few people speak today, which may possibly fill a substantial need in our energy requirements before we harness the hydrogen atom in the fusion process, which may be 50, 75 or 100 years away, at which point we will have a pollution-free ultimate energy source. I do not see problems between Canada and the United States insofar as nuclear energy is concerned.

Honourable senators, what I call the exotic solutions to the problem are, I believe, solar energy, geothermal energy, the harnessing of tides, and heat pumps. These matters were also discussed. Generally speaking, they will fulfill a very modest role in our energy requirements by the turn of the century. The possible exception there is the heat pump, in regard to which the Americans, after an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars in experimentation with exotic fuels, have settled on as being the one which has a good deal of practical application and which may well be significant, particularly in temperate climates. The heat pump is an air conditioner in reverse. It takes heat out of the outside air and puts it into the house. Heat can be taken out of air at 20 degrees below zero. It becomes counterproductive however, when the energy used to run the machine is greater than the energy recovered.

Honourable senators, may I conclude by asking what, if anything, we accomplished in Quebec City? I feel that these interparliamentary exchanges are very important, particularly, as Senator Macnaughton said, when we see the shift of power in the United States going from the executive to the legislative at this particular time. Insofar as my committee is concerned, I would put my finger on two things of significant benefit insofar as the American legislators who were there are concerned. One is that we cleared the air greatly—and this was in private conversation as well as across the table—on the question of “continentalism”. I think I can best summarize this by reading again from my speech given some weeks later in Quebec City. I have since received several letters from American senators and congressmen, commenting on how pleased they were to have at least my point of view on what is now a bad word in Canada. What I said to them was this:

This brings me to the word which is now a bad word in Canada by definition, namely, “continentalism.” To me continentalism is a bad word or a good word only depending on the definition one gives it. If you mean by continentalism the pooling of our resources with those of the United States, then it is, to a Canadian, a bad word, because it is obvious that with your consumption 10 times ours, pooling our resources would only mean that they would be exhausted 10 times as quickly as if we reserved them for our own use.

If, on the other hand, continentalism means cooperation and intelligent planning to serve the best interests of the economies of both of our countries, then it is a good word, and in this sense I am a continentalist because I believe fervently that in the years ahead, as indeed in the past, it is essential that artificial, economic and political barriers not be created along our border. If energy can be provided from western Canada to the western United States in return for energy from the eastern United States to eastern Canada and similarly in other products, then this is surely to our mutual advantage. But a concerted effort will be necessary to still the shrill voices that are so often heard, and listened to by some, particularly at a time of crisis or difficulty.

The remaining thing that I think was useful insofar as the Energy Committee was concerned, as a result of our discussions, was what is now being referred to in the newspapers as the oil swap. The Americans pointed out to us very strenuously that our cutback in oil exports to the United States—which, as you know, Mr. Macdonald has given notice will be phased out over a period of years—would create a severe hardship on certain oil refineries in the northwestern United States, such as in Montana and Idaho, where the refineries are all built and geared specifically to process Alberta oil. They are most anxious that we permit them enough time to get their Alaska oil down from Alaska to service those refineries. They did not want to increase their dependence on foreign oil sources to provide these supplies in the meantime.

We took the position that we could not recommend to our government that we should abandon the phasing out of the oil exports until more oil is available to us than the reserves in Alberta; but we did say to them that as the need they had was a short one of two or three years let us not talk about giving them more oil in exchange for dollars but giving them oil now in exchange for some of their oil later—an exchange of kind for kind—and if this could assist them we would recommend it. Several members of the committee, including myself, subsequently made representations to Mr. Macdonald and others. Negotiations are now underway between officials of his department and the appropriate American officials in this connection, and subject to technical difficulties being resolved it is hoped that something will be done to accommodate them in that respect.

If so, we certainly will have done ourselves no harm whatsoever; we will have a return of the oil at a later date and we will have improved considerably the relationship between us on this particular point. Honourable senators, I would submit that concrete benefits can accrue from meetings of this sort and that they are worthwhile for our Parliaments to pursue in years to come.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 1140)

REPORT OF THE SIXTEENTH MEETING OF THE CANADA-UNITED STATES
INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

The Sixteenth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group took place in Quebec City, April 24 to 27, 1975. This meeting was to have been held in 1974, but difficulties in the Parliamentary and Congressional time tables and national elections in both countries made a postponement necessary.

The United States delegation was led jointly by Senator Gale W. McGee (Wyoming) and Congressman Thomas E. Morgan (Pennsylvania). In addition to the two Co-Chairmen, the delegation consisted of the following members:

Senate:

Hon. John C. Culver (Iowa),
Hon. Patrick J. Leahy (Vermont),
Hon. Carl T. Curtis (Nebraska),
Hon. Ted Stevens (Alaska),

House of Representatives:

Hon. Harold T. Johnson (California),
Hon. William J. Randall (Missouri),
Hon. Lloyd Meeds (Washington),
Hon. Helen Meyner (New Jersey),
Hon. Cardiss Collins (Illinois),
Hon. Dante B. Fascell (Florida),
Hon. Sam M. Gibbons (Florida),
Hon. Michael McCormack (Washington),
Hon. James Cleveland (New Hampshire),
Hon. Robert C. McEwen (New York),
Hon. Larry Winn, Jr. (Kansas).

The Canadian delegation was led jointly by the Honourable Alan A. Macnaughton, P.C., of the Senate and the Honourable Martin O'Connell, P.C., M.P., of the House of Commons. The other members were:

Senate:

Hon. P. Lafond (Quebec),
Hon. M. Lamontagne, P.C. (Quebec),
Hon. C. McElman (New Brunswick),
Hon. G. C. van Roggen (British Columbia),
Hon. L. P. Beaubien (Quebec),
Hon. J. Flynn, P.C. (Quebec),
Hon. J. Quart (Quebec),

House of Commons:

Mr. H. Breau, M.P. (New Brunswick),
Mr. J. R. Comtois, M.P. (Quebec),
Mr. R. Daudlin, M.P. (Ontario),
Dr. M. Foster, M.P. (Ontario),
Mr. R. Kaplan, M.P. (Ontario),
Mr. J. Roberts, M.P. (Ontario),
Mr. I. Watson, M.P. (Quebec),
Mr. W. Baker, M.P. (Ontario),

Hon. A. Hamilton, P.C., M.P. (Saskatchewan),
Mr. F. Hamilton, M.P. (Saskatchewan),
Mr. D. MacDonald, M.P. (Prince Edward Island),
Mr. D. Munro, M.P. (British Columbia),
Mr. F. Oberle, M.P. (British Columbia),
Mr. S. Leggatt, M.P. (British Columbia),
Mr. G. Rondeau, M.P. (Quebec).

In the past years and in fact since the inception of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group in 1959, the Speakers of the Senate and House of Commons have served as ex-officio Co-Chairmen of the Canadian delegation. However, the inordinate demands of the parliamentary sittings more often than not made it impossible for the Speakers to take an active part in the meetings. In the two years that have elapsed since the fifteenth meeting of the group, the Canadian side had undertaken a substantial re-organization of its structure. As a result, the Canadian section was established as a formal parliamentary association with elected officers. Senator Alan A. Macnaughton and Honourable Martin O'Connell were elected earlier in the year as the Canadian Co-Chairmen, responsible for leading the Canadian delegation and also for the activities of the Canadian section in between meetings.

A number of other organizational changes were approved by the new Association at the same time. The Canadian Co-Chairmen visited Washington early in 1975 in order to submit these suggestions to their United States counterparts. They readily agreed to the following:

- a) Meetings should be held outside of the capitals to ensure better attendance.
- b) Meetings should begin Thursday evening and run through to Sunday to limit absence from the legislatures and encourage better attendance.
- c) Increased time should be spent in discussion.
- d) Background papers should be prepared and exchanged between both sides in advance to provide a factual basis for discussion.
- e) Discussion should be organized in three committees meeting concurrently so that individual members would have more chance to participate.

At this meeting in Washington and over subsequent weeks, an agenda for the discussions was worked out as follows:

- Committee 1) Energy
- Committee 2) Trans-border Problems
- Committee 3) Trade, Investment and Economic Affairs

The agenda of the Energy Committee included such matters as Canada and United States sources of energy and areas for future cooperation, bilateral problems and multilateral aspect of energy issues. The Committee concerned with trans-border and environmental problems discussed law of the sea questions, fisheries problems and conservation, air and water pollution problems, and water boundary issues. The Trade, Investment and Economic Affairs Committee considered foreign investment policies, bilateral trade issues, and problems of inflation and recession.

PLENARY SESSIONS

Delegates met for a short opening plenary session, the highlight of which was a welcome to Quebec from Mr. Harry Blank, Deputy President of the National Assembly of Quebec. Following this, they divided into three committees. They convened again in plenary session to hear reports from the three committees.

COMMITTEE REPORTS

In previous years, reports of the discussions in committees were worked out jointly between the two sides and published as a joint communiqué. As a result they tended to be cautiously phrased and not informative. This year for the first time, as another innovation, it was decided that each side should separately prepare its own reports. The Canadian reports of the three committees are attached hereto as appendix number I, II, and III. An effort has been made to record the discussion in considerable detail.

Two breakfast discussions were also organized at the request of delegates from both sides to consider problems relating to trans-border broadcasting and to defence production sharing within the European theatre of NATO. Reports are also attached of these discussions, as well as of a meeting of the Co-Chairmen called after the business meetings had been concluded to assess the results.

PROGRAMME

The United States delegation and their wives were greeted at the plane on arrival at Quebec City airport by the Canadian Co-Chairmen and proceeded to the Château Frontenac. That evening their Canadian co-hosts entertained the United States delegation and their wives at an informal buffet dinner held at the Château Frontenac.

On Friday, April 25, a luncheon was given for the delegates by the President of the Quebec National Assembly, Honourable Jean Noël Lavoie. On the same evening, a reception was given by the United States Consul-General in Quebec City, Mr. D. J. Corcoran. Later that evening, United States and Canadian delegates and wives split up into smaller groups to dine at some of the fine restaurants for which Quebec City is famous.

On the weekend, the delegates were joined by the Speaker of the Senate, Honourable Renaude Lapointe, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, Honourable James A. Jerome and Mrs. Jerome, who jointly gave a dinner in their honour at the Château Frontenac Hotel. This was preceded by a reception in the Officers' Mess at the Citadel, Quebec City's historic fortress.

A final farewell brunch was held on Sunday morning April 27, following which the delegates returned to their respective capitals.

Two sessions of the committee were held, one in the morning, from 10:00 to 12:00; and a second in the afternoon, from 3:00 until 5:30 p.m. The morning's discussion and part of the afternoon focussed on Canadian oil exports and, in particular, the timetable for cutting back those exports. The afternoon's meeting considered gas exports, uranium policy in Canada and realistic possibilities for developing new forms of energy sources.

CANADIAN OIL EXPORTS

While it was accepted that Canadian and American figures for potential reserves of oil varied greatly, depending in part on the objective of the person or institution providing the figures, there was ready acceptance of the fact that new sources of oil would require much higher levels of capital. For comparative purposes, it was noted that Western Canadian oil required an investment of about $4,000 for each barrel of producible oil per day over the lifetime of the well; Arctic oil would probably need $10,000 per barrel and tar sands oil might run from $16,000 to $20,000. Therefore the most important determinant of recoverable oil reserves was the price to be paid for the oil.

It was against this background that United States participants asked questions about the Canadian export tax. They wondered whether Canada could afford to maintain a reduced domestic price, both because the low price encouraged excessive consumption and because the funds raised were being spent to subsidize the price of oil being imported into Eastern Canada rather than being used to develop new sources of oil. Canadian speakers observed that the government was interested in moderating the inflationary effect of oil price increases but that the federal authorities were committed to an upward movement to a "world related price". The government would, however, seek to hold Canadian oil prices at a level comparable to the "rolled-in" price for United States oil, in order not to place Canadian industry at a competitive disadvantage. The aim of Canadian oil policy was to achieve self-sufficiency and therefore the government was conscious of the need to allow the price to rise to a level which would encourage both exploration and the development of new sources of oil. It was noted that at current prices Syncrude would need about $12 a barrel to cover costs. The agreement regarding Syncrude had involved giving the company an assurance that it would receive the world price for oil, but no guaranteed floor price had been offered.

This information prompted a discussion of possible future world oil price levels. One Canadian referred to a figure of $8.50 a barrel in current dollars which had been mentioned to him by a European Community energy expert. An American participant questioned his judgment, citing the rapidly developing levels of consumption in third world countries, where the marginal gain from the introduction of energy consuming production equipment was much greater than was the case in the developed world. OPEC countries recognized this trend, and were using their capital to assist the development of third world countries in part in order to ensure a continuing market for their oil. He urged participants to take note of a study by the Shell Group in London on the rapid increase in third world demand, which he thought would counterbalance the effect of any reduction in demand for oil achieved by developed countries.

Whereas the Canadian decision to place an export tax on oil was not opposed by the Americans, they expressed concern regarding the schedule announced by the Canadian government in November 1974 for cutting back gradually on oil exports to the United States. An American said that the effects of this decision had not been felt in the United States due to a temporary fall in demand owing to the U.S. recession. But as the United States economy improved and demand increased, the decision would begin to hurt, the more so because the cuts in Canadian gas exports in the northwest United States were leading consumers to convert to oil. When the Canadian oil cuts began to cause difficulty, there would be a strong popular reaction in the United States, particularly since some people would be affected by both cuts.

Canadian participants explained, using charts prepared by the National Energy Board (NEB), that Canadian exports had under law to be based on oil and gas surplus to Canadian domestic requirements. The NEB had recommended a schedule of cut-backs carefully phased to ease the shock on the United States, and intended in particular to provide assured supplies for the "locked-in" refineries in the northern U.S. prairie states until 1979. Moreover, if new oil reserves were discovered, the limits could be raised. There had been some pressure in Canada for an immediate end to oil exports to the United States, now that Canada had become a net importer of oil, but the government had resisted these pressures so as to ease the effect of the Canadian cuts on the United States.

The United States' side drew attention to the special situation created by the fact that Prudhoe Bay oil was due to be delivered to markets in the "lower-48" states by January 1978. The minimum deliveries from that date were to be 1,200,000 barrels a day, and it was hoped that the throughput of the pipeline could soon be increased to 2 million barrels a day. The United States would remain an importer of some 6 million barrels a day, but it was hoped to keep imports down to that level, primarily to limit the degree of leverage available to Arab oil producing states, but also to keep down inflationary pressures on the international oil price. The United States saw Alaskan oil as replacing Canadian oil imports and they accordingly pressed the Canadian authorities to reconsider the oil cut-back schedule and to maintain a level of exports of up to 800,000 barrels a day until January 1978. They wondered whether the proposed schedule for cutbacks had taken account of the availability of Alaskan oil and strongly urged the two governments carefully to assess the effects on each other of decisions taken for valid national reasons in the energy field, and to consider alternative policies which might cause less difficulty to the other country.

In the face of this strong request, Canadians mentioned that not only was the present quota of oil for export not being taken up, but also the Montreal pipeline was behind schedule. Therefore they thought the Americans were unlikely to experience the full effect of the cutback before January 1978 and they wondered why offshore oil might not be used temporarily to substitute for Canadian oil.

The American participants strongly urged the importance to the United States of not becoming, even temporarily, more dependent on offshore oil. In this circumstance, the Canadian participants asked whether the United States would consider undertaking to replace any oil provided in excess of the present quotas with Alaskan oil to be delivered after 1978. The United States participants said they would very much appreciate such a Canadian offer and thought it would be quite reasonable to reimburse Canada in kind. The Canadians made it clear that swap arrangements made over time involved greater difficulties even than the kind of swap arrangements currently being negotiated to supply the northern U.S. prairie refineries with Canadian crude in exchange for Alaskan oil delivered into the Canadian system. In spite of the practical difficulties, the Canadian participants undertook to inform the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of the interest expressed by the Americans and to urge the Canadian government to consider favourably any such proposal which might be made by the United States authorities.

Both sides recognized the importance of taking account of the impact of national policies on their North American neighbour and the desirability of trying to find ways of helping the other state, while still promoting their own national objectives. This included swap arrangements which could make possible lower transportation costs on both sides of the border. The Canadian side agreed to this general objective on the understanding that it was clearly understood that each country continued to pursue its national interest. They pointed out that too often Americans spoke in favour of a continental energy policy, which implied a pooling of continental energy reserves, an approach which would be disastrous for Canada. The American side insisted that this was not what they intended and seemed to appreciate the lesson in semantics. The American side also added that they were impressed by the speed with which Canada had moved to establish a new national oil policy, and wished they could do as well.

NATURAL GAS

There was some discussion of the situation with natural gas, the BTU equivalent price of which had been allowed to fall to dangerously low levels in both countries. The result was excessive consumption, without the possibility of bringing in large quantities of offshore natural gas to make up the short-fall. It was this situation which gave special urgency to bringing Alaskan gas south to the United States. U.S. law required that the oil could not be shipped south if the gas produced from the same wells was wasted. Oil should start flowing south in September 1977. There was a 2-year reservoir capacity in Alaska. This meant that a gas pipeline had to be in place by September 1979. It would take three years to build a gas pipeline. Therefore, construction had to begin by September 1976. The United States side wondered whether a Canadian decision would be taken by that date, but the question was not pursued.

American participants pointed out that cutbacks in Canadian gas exports to the northwest United States were forcing some consumers in that region to convert to oil. If oil were cut back, there would be new conversions to coal. This meant that there was an interconnection between fuels, and therefore it was not really possible to develop separate policies for each kind of fuel without considering the effect of the decision on alternative fuels.

The Canadian side described the problem with B.C. gas wells, where water had seeped into the wells and was forcing cutbacks of from 25 to 40 per cent. Because of the threat of lawsuits from Canadian consumers, the whole cutback had been taken from supplies to the U.S. consumers. However, some measures had been adopted in B.C. to reduce gas consumption, which had reduced the short-fall: some electrical generating plants had been converted from gas to oil; and a $20 million pipeline had been built, even though it would only be used for three years, to bring in some additional supplies. The United States participants did not raise the same kind of objections over these reductions as they had over proposed limitations on oil exports. The Canadian side noted that the last long-term contract for gas exports had been approved in 1970. The NEB was beginning hearings on the future of gas exports, and it was possible, when a decision was reached in about a year's time, that cuts would also be ordered in gas sales as had been the case in oil exports.

The price increases introduced by Canada within the last year were described and explained. There was a surprisingly mild reaction from the U.S. side. It was mentioned that the cost of transporting Alaskan gas to the "lower-48" would be high—twice the current price for gas sold interstate—which suggested that the U.S. participants felt that the present price for gas was relatively too low.

URANIUM

A Canadian participant raised the issue of the U.S. embargo on uranium sales into the United States. He explained that Canadians might be moving into a situation where it would have to limit uranium exports. This whole theme did not arouse much concern on the U.S. side.

The Americans showed interest in learning about public resistance in Canada to the construction of nuclear generating plants. It was pointed out that there seemed to be less public resistance in Canada than there was in the United States.

NEW SOURCES OF ENERGY

The Canadian side mentioned some new ideas for heating buildings in winter and for saving fuel generally. The suggestion was made that a heat pump and a solar furnace could even at present levels of technology provide up to 15% of the energy requirement for house heating. A U.S. participant observed that of all the new ideas, only the heat pump seemed to hold promise. He also felt that the saving achieved was minimal in terms of United States consumption.

The morning's discussion of this committee, from 10.00 to 12.00, dealt with common Law of the Sea problems, fisheries issues and the question of east coast pollution particularly in the context of tankers supplying the Eastport, Maine, refinery through Head Harbour Passage. The afternoon's meeting, from 3.00 until 5.00, considered west coast pollution from Alaskan oil into Puget Sound and other trans-boundary issues including the Great Lakes, the Champlain-Richelieu dam and the Garrison Diversion project.

LAW OF THE SEA

Although it was recognized that Canada and the United States were in agreement on some issues related to Law of the Sea, it was clear that there were bilateral differences over the international straits and the protection of the marine environment from pollution.

The Canadian side pointed out the importance to Canada of the Northwest Passage which it considered an internal water within the Canadian Arctic Archipelago and not an international strait. The objective was to ensure, through Canadian control, a protection for the unusual and fragile environment. It was suggested by a Canadian delegate that the problem of the Northwest Passage be left aside until after the Law of the Sea Conference, and then an agreement might be worked out bilaterally with the United States.

The American side replied that a vital question of security was involved and it was difficult for the United States to make an exception vis-à-vis Canada for an exclusive arrangement regarding international straits. The right of innocent passage through such straits must be maintained. However an American delegate agreed that the coastal state should have some responsibility for pollution control.

In respect to the Continental Margin, that is, the area extending from the 200 mile line to the edge of the contimental shelf, a Canadian participant explained that Canada claimed ownership of this area but was prepared to institute a system of "revenue-sharing" of resources found there with developing countries.

In regard to the exploitation of the deep seabed, the United States' position, as explained by a delegate, was that it should be a matter of "first come, first serve" with the greatest possible access to the mineral nodules on the seabed and a licensing authority which would not carry out exploration or exploitation activities itself. The Canadian side pointed out that Canada had taken a median position at the Conference whereby the International Seabed Authority would be given a mix of licensing and contracting and exploitation rights. There would be some joint ventures by private enterprise with the Authority.

In respect to fisheries it was pointed out that the position of the two countries in multilateral terms was generally very close and their objectives were similar: the proper management and conservation of the living resources in their economic zones. In this context, an American delegate wondered why Canada was helping the Cubans with a grant of $6 million to build a fish processing plant which would probably be fed by fish harvested in huge factory-like fishing ships.

FISHERIES

In discussing the bilateral disagreements over salmon fishing, the U.S. side brought out the difficulties which were encountered due to interceptions by Canadian and American fishermen taking each other's salmon, especially on the west coast where the matter is subject to a bilateral agreement. It was suggested by an American delegate that there should be co-operation in undertaking joint fishery research and intensive monitoring in order to see who is taking whose fish in the hope this might help to solve this growing irritant. A Canadian delegate pointed out that on the east coast there was no bilateral problem over salmon as the U.S. had co-operated fully.

GREAT LAKES

In discussion of the Great Lakes' issues, the U.S. side made the point that some joint overall planning and management mechanism was needed to deal with the many complex problems connected with the Great Lakes. Both sides agreed that the International Joint Commission was doing good work—particularly in regard to Great Lakes water quality—but in the opinion of the Americans it was overworked, understaffed and took too long on its reports. There was general feeling that the IJC could be strengthened.

The problem of Great Lakes water levels was raised briefly by a Canadian delegate who informed the American side that Canada was moving to try to alleviate the problem of regulation during high water periods. Although Canada had resisted having an IJC study made of possible water control alternatives in the Montreal area because it was internal Canadian waters, the federal government and Quebec now were moving ahead on their own study. Possible alternatives included the dredging of a carrying channel. Recently $600,000 had been granted to speed up the study project and ensure its completion by February 1976.

An American delegate raised the subject of the Great Lakes pilotage dispute. Because of a recent decline in ship traffic, U.S. pilots who are self-employed are not doing very well financially. Canadian pilots on the other hand are salaried civil servants for the Great Lakes Pilotage Authority and are considerably better off both financially and in respect to work conditions. This has caused discontent and there is additional irritation since the U.S. pilots do not agree with the "50-50" split of the work load in the Great Lakes basin, a principle which had been set out in a 1961 memorandum of arrangement between the two countries. On Lake Ontario the issue had become especially controversial in 1974 when both sides worked out separate working arrangements with their respective authorities.

COASTAL POLLUTION

In respect to coastal environmental concerns, there was considerable discussion of the projected east coast refinery at Eastport, Maine, and the west coast problem of supertankers transiting the Strait of Juan de Fuca to reach the U.S. refineries in Puget Sound.

On the Eastport problem, the Canadian side set forth its concern that oil tankers coming through Head Harbour Passage would constitute an intolerable risk in terms of environmental damage. There are valuable fish in these waters including lobsters which would be severely affected by an oil spill. The area was a staging area for migratory birds as well. It was pointed out that even U.S. reports recognized that Eastport was one of the most unsuitable spots for a refinery which could be found on the east coast. The approaches through Head Harbour Passage were narrow and winding. It was an area subject to fog and the currents were difficult to judge. The Maine Environmental Board had given one ruling on the subject, but a new hearing was beginning even though there was recognition that the refinery would have to make arrangements with Canada to ensure passage for tankers.

The American side pointed out that the United States had and would have a major energy shortage and that it was essential that the imported crude reach refineries in this area.

The Canadian side suggested that there were much better situations for deepwater ports along the East coast than Eastport. One project being seriously contemplated nearby was at Lorneville (Saint John Deep), in New Brunswick. From this terminal point, a pipeline system could be built to supply crude to Maine, and other north-western American areas as well as Montreal and Quebec.

A member of the American side said he considered the environmental risk of tankers coming through Head Harbour Passage was too great but another American delegate questioned whether Canada had the right under international law to prevent their coming through.

There was general recognition on the American side of the determination on Canada's part to stop the Eastport project and a common hope was expressed on both sides that opposition of environmentalists in Maine might bring it to a halt and resolve the dispute.

In the wide-ranging discussion on west coast pollution problems, no consensus was reached but both sides expressed concern for the environmental risks involved. A Canadian member had prepared a paper setting out the alternatives to Alaska oil tankers coming into the Cherry Point in Puget Sound or Port Angeles. Instead of tankers off-loading at either point, it was proposed that a "mono-buoy" or "catamaran" system be set up in Gray's Harbour on the west coast of the State of Washington to permit oil to be off-loaded off shore and be piped ashore. The cost involved needed further study but should be balanced against the cost of the proposed facilities at Port Angeles and the cost of clean-up and rehabilitation to the "island sea" after a major oil spill. This member voiced his additional concern that there were recent indications of an increased number of refineries being built in the Puget Sound area.

An American delegate replied that the U.S. now recognized that this issue was a common problem between the two countries, a fact, he admitted, which the U.S. had been "less than sensitive" to initially. But he reiterated that the U.S. was an energy-consuming nation desperately in need of energy sources. Twenty-five per cent of their known domestic oil reserves were in Alaska. It was essential that this be brought to the American market. However he emphasized that only one-fifth of the Valdez crude would be processed at Cherry Point, only one more refinery at most would be built there and no tankers larger than 120,000 deadweight tons would come in at the rate of about five a month. Further, the Governor of the state, and Senator Magnuson and he himself were in agreement that the state did not want to become a transshipment point nor a refinery area for oil for the rest of the United States. "There was too much risk", he said. This delegate considered, however, that Gray's Harbour did not appear to be a practical solution for the targeted amount of oil. In fact, the American delegate said, plans to bring one-fifth of the Alaska crude into Puget Sound area are almost "cast in concrete" at this point.

The Canadian participants emphasized that a 120,000 ton tanker was already quite large and a spill from such a tanker could be very serious. It had been established that an oil spill in Georgia Strait would not clear easily but wash back and forth. The American side was asked what safety precautions were being taken and disappointment was expressed that double-bottoms were not being made mandatory in current U.S. regulatory legislation. A Canadian delegate said there should be intensive co-operation and consultation on safety standards and suggested that the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO) might be the best forum for such co-operation.

The American delegate emphasized that every precaution would be taken in respect to safety standards. New tankers equipped with twin screws, and the latest navigational equipment and radar-controlled surveillance methods were being built to handle the oil shipments.

It was pointed out by the Americans that the official Canadian position on tanker safety was ambiguous. When the U.S. Corps of Engineers preparing legislation on safety standards solicited outside opinions, Canada was one of the strongest opponents to stricter safety control. The American side stated that on the west coast the Jones Act gave protection, whereas on the east coast there are old Liberian tankers bringing in oil. It was acknowledged however that, at present, because the Trans-mountain Pipeline supplying oil from Alberta to Washington refineries had almost dried up, some oil from Venezuela was coming in in dangerous tankers temporarily.

The American side inquired about the method of supply to refineries in the Vancouver area, and also about the possibility of feeding the U.S. refineries through the Trans-mountain Pipeline which would in turn be fed from a Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

The Canadian side acknowledged that "not a lot" of oil comes in now by ship to be refined in Vancouver but the intention is to phase this out and supply B.C. refineries by pipeline overland. As to the Mackenzie Valley line, a Canadian delegate wondered if there would be a major American objection on security grounds to the construction of the Mackenzie line carrying U.S. oil or gas through Canada. The committee did not discuss at any length the possible alternative of Alaskan tankers coming into Puget Sound—namely, the proposal to build a terminal point at Port Angeles on the Strait of Juan de Fuca from where the off-loaded oil would be piped to Puget Sound refineries.

TRANS-BOUNDARY POLLUTION

In connection with the Champlain-Richelieu dam dispute, an American delegate focussed on the point that although the IJC was going to do another study on the area, permission had been granted for the construction of the control dam to go ahead simultaneously. It was feared that once the construction project was in place, it would be impossible to prevent its use even if the IJC advised against it. He urged that no steps should be taken at this point to lock either side in a fixed position.

On the Garrison Diversion project, the Canadian side made known its concern that the project appeared to be going ahead in North Dakota despite the frequently expressed concerns of Canada that it would have considerable adverse effect, particularly in the Souris River and its tributaries. It was urged that a moratorium be declared on the project until a study of the impact could be made. It was noted that although both governments were in agreement that the IJC should look into the matter, no formal reference had been made. Both sides agreed that the IJC should have the Garrison reference.

CONCLUSION

The members of both sides agreed that it was useful and necessary that in respect to matters of irritation between the two countries, each side should try to hear the viewpoint of the other side, that proceedings of parliamentary committees might be exchanged, that interested groups should be able to be heard in the other's legislative committees, and that the channels of communication and consultation should be kept open.

The Committee met in two sessions, morning and afternoon of April 25. The pre-arranged agenda was adhered to: (a) Foreign investment policies; (b) Bilateral trade issues; (c) Problems of inflation and recession. It was agreed before the meeting that the discussion of trans-border broadcasting problems would be the subject for a special breakfast meeting on Saturday, April 26, so that interested participants from all three committees could take part. In covering the several aspects of bilateral trade issues, the topics covered in the preliminary luncheon briefings in Ottawa were used by Mr. O'Connell as points of reference. On the Canadian side lead-off speakers and spokesmen in specialized areas were arranged in advance.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT POLICIES

Senator Culver acted as chairman for the morning session which was devoted to this topic. As a background for the discussion, he noted particularly the weakening position of the American dollar internationally, the inflationary trend in the U.S. economy, and the consequent softening of the American stock market. Foreign investors were attracted to the United States in numbers and variety previously unknown. With the exception of Japanese investors who faded back because of problems arising from the oil supply difficulties, this trend toward increasing investment by foreigners has continued. In the past few months it has increasingly aroused the concern of Congress. The earlier attitude to foreign investment in the United States was largely neutral and benign because of heavy U.S. investment elsewhere. A trade war could only harm American foreign investments. Congress last studied indirect investment in 1949 and direct investment in 1959. To provide for reliable data on which to base future action, Congress passed the Foreign Investment Study Act in October 1974. This Act called for an 18-month study of the extent and impact of existing foreign investments by Treasury and Commerce, to include analyses of the effects of both direct and portfolio investments on the U.S. balance of payments and the effects of financing methods on American financial markets. It was also to include an analysis of the effects of direct investment on employment opportunities and practices in sensitive areas like national security, energy as well as agriculture and environment. Recommendations were expected on ways to harmonize state and federal interests, together with a proposed model to serve as a basis for discussion with potential investors such as Iran and other OPEC countries. For the first time, Senator Culver said Congress was experiencing "the ugly American come home". At the same time it was becoming aware of the sensitivities of countries like France, certain Latin American states and especially Canada, about American investment. It is expected that future American legislation would provide safeguards similar to those Canada had already enacted in its Foreign Investment Review Act.

A Canadian participant gave the background to the passage of the Foreign Investment Review Act which was not the only legislative response to public concern about the high percentage of foreign ownership in recent years, but was certainly the strongest. The purpose of this Act was to give Canadians greater control of their economic future by ensuring that investments of specified types by non-Canadians could be made only after the government had assessed that they were likely to be of significant benefit to Canada. Part I of this Act had been in effect since April 9, 1974. It required that the federal government screen foreign takeovers of Canadian business above a certain size. Under Part II, which has not yet been enacted, screening would also be necessary for the establishment of new business in Canada by foreigners.

An American participant agreed that Canada had been right to legislate against such a high percentage of foreign investment. However, he applauded the increase in multinational investment in the United States, and he hoped Canada would be moderate in the application of its legislation. He invited Canadian comments on problems likely to arise in this area. The United States, he felt, needed a better Trade Act so it could negotiate more seriously at GATT. Disclosure regulations would have to form a part of future American legislation. Some restrictions on specific areas of foreign investment would be necessary. He cited shipping as one such area. The biggest employer in his district was in fact a French firm.

A Canadian responded that the Foreign Investment Review Act had satisfied Canadian critics of foreign investment in Canada. It had an additional objective, however, to emphasize the need to increase Canadian involvement in the financing of Canadian business. He delineated the limits of the Foreign Investment Review Act and pointed out that it did not change the direction of foreign investment.

An American asked when Phase II of the Canadian bill would be put into effect, which industries would be protected, and what percentage of Canadians must be represented on the boards of directors of firms. She also wished to know how Canadian trade with Cuba had been affected by American legislation. Answers to these questions were given in asides, including a later explanation by a Canadian M.P. on how Canadian subsidiary companies were affected by restrictions imposed by the U.S. Competition Bill in fulfilling orders allowed by Canadian law. A Canadian legislator was not as sanguine that Canadians could do without unrestricted flow of foreign capital for the development of resources. Canada had less need for equity capital but risk capital would still be necessary and should be welcomed.

What Canadian experience could tell the United States was shown by examples given by two Canadian participants. One member described difficulties of the Bluebird Transport Company in his constituency. Another noted that transport, notably the CPR, had long been controlled outside Canada, while in other areas Canadians did invest at home. He cited the example of Imperial Oil.

A Canadian turned the discussion in a new direction with his comment that it should be recognized that American investment in Canada had been in the main friendly and supportive, that it had come from a country with similar social values. The capital that now stood before the gates of U.S. markets was not so, that in the main it would come from countries with very different, even hostile social and political objectives. The United States side agreed with this forecast of the character of future foreign investment in the United States, noting that there had been no real problems in the Canada-U.S. situation because of the ease of discussion about it arising from the common democratic foundations of our two societies. A further threat in this new direction of foreign investment in the United States was seen in its effect on the shaping of political action through election contributions for example. He said he was indebted to the Canadian side for bringing out this new element in the foreign investment discussion. The U.S. side said it believed the United States had a stake in Canadian prosperity and vice versa. Both countries faced the same dilemma, they needed capital to create jobs, and foreign capital can do that. He gave the example of Japanese investment in cattle feeding yards in Australia which had led Japan to buy Australian as opposed to American meat in quantity. New factories in new places should be encouraged. He took the long view that the United States had a lot to gain from prosperity in Canada.

An American participant attributed the American overseas take-overs to the over-valuation of the American dollar following the Bretton Woods agreements. He noted that so far OPEC money has been invested in safe areas, U.S. government bonds, short-term bank notes, etc. There was no investment in land. He asked for some explanation of why Canadians did not invest in Canada.

A Canadian replied that in some ways we were the authors of our own problems. Our dollar had been frozen until fairly recently. It was difficult to find Canadian vehicles to invest in. Traditionally we had invested chiefly through the New York market. He agreed that Canadians were the beneficiaries of foreign investment in Canada in the main, but there was a desire to reverse this trend and to increase Canadian investment at home.

Another Canadian observed that the political climate would be inhospitable for foreign investment in some areas in Canada, especially in the resource field. He drew attention to western provincial interests in oil and gas, by way of example. The United States side felt that there was a need for new international agreements regarding foreign investment. New rules were needed for OECD and GATT, and there should be a review of what is understood to constitute fair trade. On the specific question of U.S. trade with Cuba he felt the prospects for re-opening this trade within a year were very good.

BILATERAL TRADE ISSUES

The Canadian Co-Chairman opened the afternoon session on bilateral trade issues and problems of inflation and recession.

A Canadian participant led off the discussion of this topic. He described three areas in Canadian-U.S. relations which could be regarded as old business, and then suggested new issues under discussion. The trade-off situation of 1970-71 no longer held. The shopping list approach to trade matters was past. The automotive pact issue had altered as a result of the shift from the profit picture for Canada in 1971 to the $1.3 billion deficit picture in 1975. Fundamental questions should now be asked about the industry as a whole, as the trends towards deficit were more than cyclical in nature. In the defence area Canada is now buying more. On tourist exemptions Canada had moved some distance to meet American views by increasing the duty-free exemption for Canadian tourists.

Under the loose heading of new issues he included the difficulties in the export-import of agricultural products. The Canadian refusal of entry for U.S. beef arising from the DES controversy had been countered by the much broader American embargo of Canadian beef, pork and hogs. In the Michelin tyre case a fundamental difference of views was evident. What was regarded in Canada as legitimate assistance under a programme designed to ameliorate regional disparities in economic opportunity was viewed as protection by the United States which took countervailing action. In looking forward to the GATT negotiations it might be that in solving multilateral trade problems some of our bilateral ones may be solved as well.

AGRICULTURE

An American participant responded to the agricultural question in some detail. Heavy losses by the operators of feed lot cattle had backed up to create an oversupply of ranch cattle. The whole world was surprised. A commodity thought to be in short supply had in fact become a surplus supply. Why had this happened? There were several possible explanations, but no certain answers. EEC countries and Japan had stopped buying in North America in large quantities. The U.S. and Canada had taken action against each other, thereby inhibiting sales. In that matter there had been a meeting between Secretary Butz and Mr. Whelan and some accommodation appeared to be possible. He thought the U.S. was ready to move on the embargo on hogs if Canada could be more accommodating about slaughter-fresh beef. He described the conflict over the importation of cattle fed with a diet supplement containing DES. In his opinion there should be free trade in agricultural products. Canada and the U.S. should be partners to sell protein around the world. He proposed one way of avoiding conflicts arising from national agricultural policies. Canadian witnesses could be invited to appear before U.S. committees of Congress to explain Canadian policies. At present Canada and Australia produce beef to sell at a price equal to the tax per pound on U.S. beef.

A Canadian replied to these agricultural questions. He agreed that Canadian beef producers would like to return to a North American concept too. Australian beef is presently selling in Canada at 12 cents a pound, for the producer. In Canada we got into the surplus beef situation as a result of a surplus in grain which was then used to feed cattle. But his main concern was the "over-response" of the United States in correcting what were thought to be mistakes in production. He saw agricultural products as great long-term exports of the United States. Secretary Butz had turned the machine around. The emphasis now was grow and sell. Canada was moving to a stock-loss position. Which way was best? Canada and the U.S. should perhaps be moving together to an international agricultural agreement. In such an agreement it would be important to know how the state-trading nations would act as this would affect the United States position.

An American participant took up the international agreements theme. In Florida the problem was food, specifically citrus fruits, not meat, but it was good sense to move toward such agreements. There had to be world reserves of prime commodities. There was a need for a range of prices. It was also important to stabilize the glut-surplus situation in commodities. Many people in the United States were advocating international food storage programmes. Another American felt that the state-trading nations were a disruptive influence in agricultural trading arrangements. They bought in such large and well-publicized quantities. A Canadian agreed that these countries were getting the best of it and that there was need for a co-ordinated effort in trading with them.

A Canadian participant brought forward two problems. The first related to his experience in a border constituency where difficulties arose because of inflexible immigration regulations for casual farm labourers who wished to work in one country or the other at times of peak harvest. His other problem was a social one, related to the cost of hospital care and the need for reciprocal arrangements which the Chairman agreed to consider another time.

TRADE ISSUES

An American participant then took up the Michelin Tyre Company case. It was, in fact, one of the few times the U.S. had countervailed against Canadian manufactures. The United States held the view that this plant was built with the specific intention of penetrating the American market. On the auto-pact he suggested it must be good, it had made both sides unhappy. It was, he said, understandable that a one billion dollar overhang was worrying to Canada. He sought Canadian views about why the pact was not working. Somehow production had got out of balance. While Canadians still favoured large cars for long distance travel, the American buyers were concentrating on smaller cars to meet the gas shortage. A Canadian made the case for the Canadian manufacturers of auto parts in the Windsor area who are suffering this problem. Canada produces the parts for the large cars which it sends to the United States. The small parts now in demand for the smaller cars are produced in the United States. This had aggravated the Canadian deficit situation. Another Canadian described the situation in his constituency where successive modifications in the General Motors products had kept pace with the change in demand for small cars.

GATT CONFERENCE

The Chairman then introduced a discussion of GATT which he said had worked to the comparative advantage of both countries. If we depended on free trade, supplies would be available, but would not be as secure. The new trading nations from the Third World would affect the thrust of future negotiations. Developed nations would be asked to expand their bargaining to include the concept of sharing with the less developed countries. Canada was probably more sympathetic to Third World interests than the United States might be because Canada was also a provider of raw materials. The Canadian desire was to alter the tariff structure a little, by taking a "sector" approach to the negotiation of items. Canada views such negotiations as a possible vehicle for attacking barriers to trade (particularly tariff escalation) which act as a constraint to the further processing of resources in Canada prior to export. Canada also shared the concern of Third World countries about security of supply. If resource processing and manufacturing facilities were geared to supply to foreign markets, Canada and other exporters would have a greater vested interest in maintaining the level of supply than is the case when resource-consuming countries were simply seeking assurances of supply of relatively unprocessed raw materials. This concern was particularly relevant to non-renewable resources like oil and gas. He suggested that export taxes should be used to meet this difficulty.

The recent United States Trade Bill seemed to reflect American concerns in the same area. Should Canada respond to those features of the Act?

THE U.S. TRADE ACT, 1974

An American participant said he had been a member of the committee which discussed the Trade Act. It was not viewed as a retaliatory measure. There had not been any discussion of Canada. The Act was to facilitate expansion in the future, otherwise restrictions would have been written into it. On GATT there were restraints on the U.S. bargaining team arising from state and local governments. It was always a problem for the United States to deliver after the bargaining. It would be useful if some sort of liaison could be set up between the bargainers and Congress.

A Canadian said that on the auto-pact problem he was optimistic. Cars would continue to be a high personal priority item in a high income society. On the use of export tariffs, they were designed to raise revenue to pay the increased price of OPEC oil. He wondered if in the future it might be possible to reverse quotas. In his opinion the developed nations had a responsibility to give the Third World countries the chance to sell to us, not just to support them with aid hand-outs. He referred to the opportunity given to Japan after the war to rehabilitate its economy in this way. It was wrong to regard some industries as the prerogative of developed countries. It was now possible to have low cost labour in the highly developed industries, for example, the manufacture of television sets in Taiwan. Provision must be made for the supply of sophisticated technology to the Third World to allow it to develop.

Another American participant referred to the U.S. Trade Act. American concerns in it had been more related to the EEC countries. The bill was under discussion during the period of difficulty about sugar prices which raised the question of supply of commodities generally. He reiterated that Canada was not seen as a problem, that no protection or retaliation against Canada had been implied. Yet another American participant stated that he had opposed the Trade Act as it affected free trade. It resulted from the constrictions of the economic depression in the United States, the threat to American manufacturers, like U.S.

shoe and car factories for example. A fellow American noted that the U.S. trade position was strong, but the situation had become more competitive when the American dollar lost value. The incentives arising from the dollar position and cheap labour to set up business abroad had been reduced.

CONCLUSION

An American participant said that in his view there was a growing interest in a new order in international trade and relations. The rigidities of GATT should be broken down. He agreed that the less developed countries needed assurance of access to markets for goods produced as a result of the supply of technology to them. But all countries needed access to global scarcities. The U.S. with 6% of world population consumed 35% of world resources. These resources were not inexhaustible and the less developed countries now knew it. They would increasingly demand a role in trade talks. This could be a serious political problem. He felt that Canada could provide real leadership in this matter. The United States was still preoccupied with spheres of power. It was not as sympathetic to the aspirations of the less developed countries and this reduced the ability of American negotiators to respond. On the Trade Act he referred to the provisions relating to dislocation in industry resulting from obsolescence. Trade adjustment provisions in the bill would permit a more liberal treatment. The unions were, however, cynical about this. It was "burial assistance" in their view.

A Canadian participant noted that Canada too has subsidies to assist in reconstruction of industry to meet manufacturing changes. Another Canadian concluded the discussion of the protection of manufactured markets. He explained the example of the Canadian textile industry in which Canada recognized protection would not be possible and other methods like retraining, early pensions, etc., had been sought to meet the consequences of foreign competition in this field.

PROBLEMS OF INFLATION AND RECESSION

A member of the Canadian group led off the discussion of this topic. He based his comments on the American situation, but they were relevant to Canada as well. Governments claimed to accept Keynesian economics, but did not act as if they did. In the main, short-term decisions were taken whose cumulative effect was over-reaction to correct economic difficulties. One of the problems for the United States in developing measures to combat the effects of the recession was the slowness of the United States to recognize that a crisis really did exist. As a result, there was such a time lag before measures could take effect that it was likely the U.S. economy would right itself without them. In his opinion the seeds had already been planted for the next recession because the measures taken to cope with the current recession would impede the expansion of the economy which was already recovering. Canada would find herself in the same position because of the close ties to American monetary policy. He suggested that it would be good for parliamentarians on both sides to look closely at the forecasting techniques on which these short-term legislative solutions were based. In his experience they were always bad, and had been consistently wrong. This was an important topic for discussion, a topic which did not involve political ideology.

An American replied that the measures to meet the economic situation in the United States were tied to the international situation on oil and commodities and to the high unemployment rate. Congressional committees were inhibited in their action by a five-year planning requirement. But they were beginning to appreciate the urgent need to take long-range forecast data into account. Another American said that economists do not understand politics. It is hard for politicians to follow through with hard economic decisions.

A Canadian participant thought that the root of the problem lay in planning a limit of spending. Canada was trapped by its social and support systems.

THE "AD HOC" COMMITTEE ON BROADCASTING RELATIONS

Participants:

Representative Dante Fascell, Chairman
 Senator George van Roggen
 Senator Charles McElman
 Mr. Robert Kaplan, M.P.
 Mr. J. R. Comtois, M.P.
 Mr. Stuart Leggatt, M.P.
 Mr. Frank Oberle, M.P.
 Senator Patrick Leahy
 Rep. Lloyd Meeds
 Rep. Robert McEwen

While the American delegates interested in broadcasting were grouped in the Committee on Trans-Border Problems, the interested Canadians, treating it more as an economic question, were mainly in the Committee on Trade, Investment and Economic Affairs. A special meeting was arranged during the breakfast period on Saturday so that the two groups could get together on the subject of broadcasting.

The American side expressed its concern in regard to two aspects of Canadian broadcasting policy which had an impact on U.S. interests: a) the Canadian government's policy as revealed in recently introduced legislation, to disallow tax deduction on advertising by Canadians on U.S. television stations, and, b) the C.R.T.C.'s decision which required deletion from Canadian cable transmission of commercials originating in U.S. stations across the border.

The main discussion at the meeting centred on the cable deletion issue.

An American delegate stated that the commercial message was an integral part of a T.V. programme, which the advertiser had bought in its entirety. The Canadian deletion of the commercial and substitution of a Canadian-sold commercial during the programme constituted "piracy" and an infringement under international law of property rights.

A Canadian delegate responded that he doubted whether an infringement under property law was involved. Once a signal is emitted, it may well lose property rights. The C.R.T.C.'s policy is at present being challenged in the courts. A Buffalo station put the question to litigation and the Federal Court of Canada ruled in favour of the deletion. An appeal is now before the Supreme Court.

The Canadian delegate expressed the opinion that copyright law was not infringed upon by cable deletion as long as the programme being transmitted was transmitted live, without taping for playing later. Further, he said that no property rights were involved in cable deletions of commercials since, in the Canadian view, the property that advertisers were buying was "audience", not the programme in its entirety.

It became clear that not all the Canadians supported commercial deletion, but several Canadians elaborated on the Canadian policy which they said was directed to solving fundamental economic problems faced by Canadian television stations and networks in the North American context. Eighty per cent of the Canadian population lives within 100 miles of the U.S. border and risk being swamped by nearby U.S. signals. Of particular concern were the number of American television stations that have been established and licensed near the Canadian border, whose audience is predominantly Canadian and whose objective is obviously a penetration of the Canadian advertising market. A large proportion of the commercials in these U.S. programmes are paid for by Canadian enterprises, which means taking across the border advertising dollars which the competing Canadian stations need to remain viable. The C.R.T.C. believes its commercial deletion policy will help keep this advertising in Canada.

An American delegate voiced his concern that if such a policy were persisted in, it might result in retaliation. If the commercials were found to be an integral part of the programme and the cable companies are prohibited from carrying any part of the programme when the commercial was deleted, this could result in U.S. retaliation and loss to the American audiences of such popular Canadian programmes as "Hockey Night in Canada".

Both sides agreed that the principle of the free flow of information across the border should not be tampered with.

The United States side said that it did not object to fair competition but that Canadian cable systems take the U.S. programme out of the air, paying nothing for it, deleting the commercial and selling the time to a Canadian advertiser. For its part, the F.C.C. did not allow the U.S. cable system to alter the Canadian T.V. stations programmes which they distributed. The American side considered that their signals should be treated similarly across the border.

In response, the Canadian delegation pointed out that the disparity of the two countries presented Canada with the vital need to ensure the existence of a separate Canadian broadcasting system. They assured the Americans that cable television systems themselves were not selling replacement commercial messages. It was Canadian T.V. stations which could sell the substitution commercials. The Canadian side emphasized that the United States stations were not licensed to serve Canada but that this was what some of them were attempting to do.

It was pointed out by the Canadians that the commercial deletion policy is implemented not solely against American border stations but is also promoted within Canada as well in order to protect the economic viability of small local stations from the competition of the more powerful stations in larger Canadian centers. Further, it was the Canadian understanding that such a policy was being implemented by American authorities in the United States, e.g., in Buck's County, Pennsylvania, in order to protect local stations.

The American side said it understood that the Canadian policy was mandatory if a cable television company wished to have its licence renewed. The Canadian side disagreed and gave instances where licences had been renewed in competitive border areas despite no commercial deletion.*

Both sides agreed the discussion had been informative though no consensus had been reached. Several delegates agreed that further international complications could ensue in connection with commercials included in programmes coming from satellite transmission systems.

'AD HOC' COMMITTEE MEETING ON DEFENCE
PRODUCTION SHARING—SATURDAY, APRIL 26

Among Participants:

Senator John Culver, Chairman
Rep. Cardiss Collins
Rep. Samuel Gibbons
Hon. M. O'Connell, M.P.
Mr. H. Breau, M.P.
Mr. David MacDonald, M.P.
Mr. Donald Munro, M.P.
Mr. R. Daudlin, M.P.

At the request of an American participant, a special meeting was held over breakfast to discuss the need for coordinated defence procurement within the European Theatre of NATO. He cited a recent U.S. study which estimated that the annual excess cost from short runs of defence equipment was costing up to $20 billion annually. There were further military consequences, as a result of incompatible ammunition and the lack of interchangeability of spare parts. The same study pointed to the Canada-U.S. defence production sharing agreements as a model for Europe, although it was recognized that Canada's position differed from that of several European allies in that it had no capability to produce independently a separate weapons system.

MEETING OF CO-CHAIRMEN—A POST-MORTEM

Following the plenary meeting, the Co-Chairmen held a session to review the new arrangements for holding the annual group meeting and to consider plans for the next meeting in the United States.

It was agreed that holding the meeting away from capitals and beginning Thursday evening produced much better attendance at the meeting.

It was agreed that arranging three committees with reports from each committee to plenary provided the right combination of well-focussed discussion and general exposure to the full range of problems. Specific issues raised at the meeting could be handled in 'ad hoc' sessions, particularly over breakfast. In future, reports to plenary of committee discussion should hit highlights only and be designed to stimulate general discussion.

* There appear to be grounds for both points of view since in certain regional cases the C.R.T.C. required—the commercial deletion as a condition of re-licensing, whereas in other cases it was a matter of promoting and encouraging the policy.

It was felt that the social programme might have been cut back even further. A suggestion was made that a dinner meeting might involve inviting two or three panelists to discuss a current issue of concern to the legislators of both countries, but not necessarily one involving Canadian-American relations.

Approval was expressed of the practice of inviting spouses to attend meetings as observers. It was suggested that the panel discussion would also be of interest to spouses.

The Co-Chairmen were urged to meet in good time before the next meeting to decide on the agenda. It was agreed that the background statistics and maps were a helpful aid to discussion. It was suggested, however, that at the next meeting the discussion in each committee might be more structured with participants on both sides designated to lead off on specified topics. This would require preparing more detailed agenda for each committee.

THE SENATE

UNIFORMS OF PROTECTIVE STAFF—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not know if this is a proper question for the Leader of the Government, but I would draw to his attention, and to the attention of the Senate, that the members of our protective staff are wearing their winter uniforms. In view of the high temperatures prevailing recently, this is rather inhumane treatment. Would the Leader of the Government look into this matter and ascertain whether the members of the protective staff may be allowed to wear their summer uniforms?

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the question which has been posed by the honourable senator. I can inform the Senate that yesterday morning I directed an inquiry pointing out some of the humanitarian problems posed by current heat in Eastern Canada.

Senator Argue: But I see that they are still in their winter uniforms.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT, NO. 2

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-53, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, No. 2.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-53 is an amendment to an original act which was passed in 1967. The purpose of that act was to provide for an advance payment to farmers in the area within the Canadian Wheat Board region, principally in the Prairie provinces, in the event that they could not deliver their grain to the elevator system. The reason for that was that at that time production was in excess of sales and there was a heavy carryover. Because of the system under the Wheat Board, the farmers in that region could not sell their grain in any other manner. Under the Wheat Board provisions they were obligated to sell only within their own provinces; they could not cross provincial boundaries. Since then there have been amendments allowing for sales throughout the West, but they are still not able to sell outside that region, and as a result they were not able to deliver in many cases. They were under quotas as to the amounts they could deliver. They could not get cash into their hands and they could not sell the grain outside their region, though in certain cases they could sell it to other farmers or to feed mills. Obviously, this was a limited market. Hence the system of advance payment was created, and farmers could borrow against grain that they had produced and had in store on the farm. Subsequent amendments to the act increased the amount of advance that they could obtain.

● (1410)

The advance is available only on three grains, namely, wheat, oats and barley. The present system is based on a percentage, which is 66 2/3 per cent of the initial price established for the grain itself. The advance payment is interest free, provided that the farmer delivers the grain to the elevator when he is called upon to do so, or when he is able to do so as a result of the quota being open. When he does that, the advance is deducted from the payment to the farmer and interest is not charged. If a farmer were to come forward and pay cash, then interest would be charged at 12 per cent.

Honourable senators, that is a general background of this legislation.

Bill C-53 contains three basic elements, following an improvement introduced in March of this year by an amendment which increased to $15,000 per year per farmer the total amount available by way of advance. This bill provides for two specific increases. One deals with an advance to finance the drying of damp or tough grain. Under an order in council, the government can provide by regulation for this advance payment when it is recognized that there is a serious problem with damp grain as a result of fall rains or unseasonable snows. When the grain is harvested and is too damp for storage or for sale, an advance payment can be made to finance the drying of the grain. The amendment increases the advance payment for this purpose from 10 cents a bushel to 25 cents a bushel, and increases the maximum from $600 to $1,500.

The second specific increase is in the amount of the advance payment in circumstances where the grain cannot be harvested at all and is left unthreshed in the fields. That has occurred on a number of occasions when, because of very early snows, the grain is left over the winter months and is not threshed until the spring. In such cases the maximum advance payment is increased from $3,000 to $7,500. This follows the amendment introduced in March increasing the total maximum advance payments to $15,000 per permit holder.

Another amendment is the result of an alteration in a provision permitting farmers to sell what is called "off board". The alteration occurred approximately two years ago, and provided that farmers could sell feed grains off board through the elevator system on, basically, an open market. Under the original act, however, when a farmer obtained an advance through the Wheat Board, he undertook to deliver grain to the elevator to cover that advance, and the payment then was to be made by deduction from his cheque. In certain cases now the wheat, or the grain, would not be delivered to the Wheat Board but would be delivered to an elevator system for sale outside the Wheat Board. A change in the law was required to make sure that payment could be made to the Wheat Board on delivery of that grain, even though it is not delivered for Wheat Board purposes.

So, the amendment provides that this can be done, and it will simply mean that whether the farmer delivers to the Wheat Board or for Wheat Board use or for off board use, the payment can be made legitimately to the Wheat Board to cover the indebtedness. There will be no change insofar as the interest is concerned. Again interest will not be charged provided the payment is made in that way at that time through an elevator system recognized and licensed by the Wheat Board.

These amendments are intended to fit the new system of marketing of feed grains in Western Canada, and to bring up the whole system of advances to a more realistic figure under present cost conditions in farming in the Wheat Board region in the West. I commend the bill to you.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, some of the bills that come to this house from the other place have explanatory notes attached, and some do not. This particular bill does not have any explanatory notes, and I think it has been pointed out on previous occasions that it would be most helpful to us in this chamber if we had explanatory notes covering revisions in legislation. As one Manitoban to another, or perhaps to use a broader term, as one plainsman to another, I move the adjournment of this debate.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, there may be some misunderstanding involved here, but the copy of the bill that I have does have explanatory notes.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I notice that I have a copy of the first reading of the bill in the other house, and it does contain explanatory notes. But the copy I have as passed by the other house on July 8, 1975, does not include these explanatory notes. We can always refer to the first reading copy, but I think there should be some consistency in this matter, and when legislation comes to us from the other place it should come in its entirety.

Senator Manning: Before the debate is adjourned, would the sponsor permit me to ask a question?

Senator Molgat: Yes. I shall be happy to provide the answer if I can, and if I cannot, then the answer can be obtained later.

Senator Manning: Why is it provided in this bill that it shall come into force on proclamation rather than on royal assent?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I cannot guarantee that my answer is correct, but I believe that it is connected with the bill which was passed in March increasing the maximum advance payment to $15,000 per permit holder. That was passed after the beginning of the crop year and after certain loans and advances had been made. The result was that that legislation was not proclaimed. The increase in that legislation from $6,000 to $15,000 was passed by both houses and forms part of an act not yet proclaimed. I understand it is the intention to proclaim this bill in conjunction with the other. I presume that is the reason for doing it in this way, and I understand that it is the expectation, provided that this house agrees and that royal assent is given, that it would take effect at the beginning of the next crop year, which is August 1.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of the sponsor. If it cannot be answered now, perhaps the answer could be made available later. Since this act has been in operation for some time, would the mover of the bill be able to provide us with statistics as to any losses that have been incurred, what amounts are outstanding and the general financial record of the transactions that have taken place?

● (1420)

Senator Molgat: Yes, I will be very happy to provide that information in complete detail. I can in summary reply to Senator Buckwold by telling him that the record of repayment has been nothing short of phenomenal, being 99.99 per cent. At present there is outstanding some $16 million out of total advances during the year of something in the order of $40 million. The $16 million outstanding is presumably with respect to grain not yet delivered, but the overall record is very good and I will be happy to provide accurate figures to the house.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion, in amendment, of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Norrie, to the motion of the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the adjournment of the debate stands in my name with respect to the amendment moved by Senator Neiman to refer the bill to committee. The only reason I stood this item was that I did not wish this bill to be referred to committee if the Senate were to make a decision with respect to the bill presented by Senator Argue favouring total abolition of the death sentence. If such a decision were made it would be useless to refer this bill, presented by Senator Robichaud, to committee. I had hoped that Senator Prowse, who is present today, would resume the debate on the bill presented by Senator Argue. It seems to me that a decision must be made with respect to Bill S-23 before we deal with the bill presented by Senator Robichaud. For this reason, I intend to stand this item. I hope that Senator Prowse will proceed with Bill S-23 at the next sitting.

Order stands.

THE ECONOMY

DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy.—
(Honourable Senator McDonald).

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, a few days ago when I adjourned this debate I did so on the understanding that perhaps some honourable senators would be interested in taking part in it. However, many senators with whom I have spoken seem to be of the opinion that because of the fact that a budget debate has taken place in the other place this debate is outdated. If no other honourable senator wishes to speak on this particular matter, I have no desire to do so and propose that it be removed from the Order Paper.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps it would be a good idea for Senator Lamontagne to give us his reaction to the budget, and compare it with his proposals.

Senator Lamontagne: It is a good budget.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

FORESTRY

DEVASTATION OF FORESTS OF EASTERN CANADA BY THE SPRUCE BUDWORM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. G. Percival Burchill rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to acceleration in the devastation of the forests of Eastern Canada and adjoining areas by the ravages of the spruce budworm.

He said: Honourable senators, we are shortly to conclude a very active and busy session. In the years I have spent in this house, I do not recall any session when so much legislation has been introduced in the Senate or come from the other place. We have dealt with a great variety of important matters, and our committees have been constantly active with a heavy workload. It has indeed been a busy session.

Some of the matters dealt with have concerned international relations while others have concerned the domestic well-being of this country, but none is as important to my own province of New Brunswick, or the adjoining areas, as the matter I intend to introduce this afternoon.

I refer to the destruction of the spruce and balsam forests of Eastern Canada by the spruce budworm, a matter which I consider to be so serious that I have prepared a paper, which I intend to read, covering the salient points of the situation. This is a matter of great importance to all Canadians. The battle with the spruce budworm has been waged in New Brunswick for the past

[Senator Flynn.]

20 years, and this year has seen the worst infestation in the history of the province. I have been induced to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate because of the widespread intensity of the infestation. While motoring across the province two weeks ago, I was shocked by the appearance of the spruce trees bordering the highways. They are infested with the budworm.

I have also been induced to alert the Senate to the current situation by headlines which have appeared in the press. One in the Ottawa Journal reads: "No Dollars Left for Budworm Spraying;" while another, in the Fredericton Gleaner, says: "Budworm Spraying will be Reduced;" and yet another, in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, reads: "New Brunswick Paying the Shot. No Ottawa Help."

My first contact with the budworm was in 1915 when it appeared on timberland on which our firm was operating. Dr. Webb, Director of the Maritime Forest Research Centre in the Canadian Forestry Service, in an excellent paper prepared in 1972 and read at the University of Maine, said, "From then until the present it has been a very compelling problem."

Honourable senators, when we think of trees, we think of New Brunswick because 85 per cent of the province's 28,000 square miles is forested, and, with the exception of British Columbia, no province in Canada relies more heavily on its forest industry for its industrial life than does New Brunswick. The devastation by the budworm was largely responsible for the decline of our lumber industry, and if not checked or controlled it will cripple the pulp and paper industry. As you know, spruce fibre is the life blood of the pulp and paper industry. It is estimated that 250 million cords of wood have been destroyed since 1909.

I refer again to Dr. Webb's paper, in which he said:

This insect has been studied about as extensively as any insect in history. Some of the most sophisticated analyses ever made of a natural field population have been applied to the budworm and we still cannot explain with certainty how outbreaks are controlled in nature.

Scientists and pathologists have been continuously experimenting with measures and strategies to control the insect but to date have not made any appreciable progress. A considerable amount of research effort has also been made by the Canadian Forestry Service and the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association. The forests of the State of Maine and the Eastern seaboard of the United States have also been affected. I noticed a press dispatch in the Globe and Mail of June 21 which contained the suggestion by Mr. C. Raymond Haley, President of the Oxford Paper Division of Ethyl Corporation of Richmond, Virginia, to the effect that a joint United States-Canada attack on the spruce budworm be made to save 124 million acres of trees threatened by the insect in both countries.

With no assured permanent control in sight, the only alternative, as an emergency measure, has been to apply insecticides from the air. In 1953 a consortium, Forest Protection Limited, was formed for the purpose of spraying the affected areas. The consortium consisted of the provincial government and the pulp and paper companies of the province. "The federal government was a partner at the outset, contributing one-third of the cost, with the provincial government contributing one-third, and private industry one-third. This arrangement continued until 1967. From 1967 to 1972, the federal government declined to pay anything. In 1973 it resumed payment on the basis of a different formula, which amounted to about one-third of the former cost, and the same in 1974. In 1975, it has again declined to contribute towards the cost.

The only construction I can put on that refusal, honourable senators, is that the Department of the Environment simply does not know about what is taking place. I cannot think of any other construction to put on it. If representatives of the federal government came down to the province of New Brunswick today and went through the forest areas—and I do not care which section they go through—they would see the damage that is taking place. I just cannot understand why it will not contribute to the cost of spraying, which is the only way known today of checking the devastation and salvaging our forest areas.

One of the difficulties with spraying is the damaging side effects of the chemical used. DDT was used until 1968, but it was proven to be a killer of young fish and fish food. Another insecticide was selected by the Chemical Control Research Institute of Canada, a division of the federal Department of the Environment, and this chemical is called fenitrothion. Dr. Webb said of it in his paper, that while it is not entirely blameless, it is certainly less of a menace than DDT. Dr. Barney Fleiger, Manager of Forest Protection Limited, tells us that 24 planes are being used, flying about two and a half hours each day, and three ounces of the active ingredient is applied to the acre.

The use of stronger insecticides arouses criticism from many sources. There is a case now before the courts instituted by Bridges Brothers, a firm in St. Stephen, which is suing Forest Protection Limited for allegedly damaging their blueberry crop in 1970.

That great industrialist of New Brunswick, K.C. Irving, who not only uses the forests but is a great lover of the forests, has done a tremendous job in reforestation. This year he has planted his sixty millionth seedling but, according to the newspapers, he has commented that the chemical used to spray last year was "about as effective as dishwater." There you have the two sides to the story.

While this year the federal government is not paying a share of the cost of spraying, the Canadian Forestry Service does a technical assessment of the spruce budworm population by counting the insects at 1,000 points across the province, and designating the time of spraying and areas to be sprayed. However, in spite of all the efforts, this year we are in the midst of the widest infestation in the history of the province.

On Saturday last I took a trip on a forest road to a fishing pool. I tell you, honourable senators, that the appearance of the trees on that forest road was a sad sight. All were dead or dying. If the budworm infestation is not controlled or checked the pulp and paper industry in the East is, to say the least, threatened.

The spraying season in 1975 has now ended, and this session of Parliament will soon recess for the summer, so there is no time or opportunity to do anything now. However, it is my intention, when the session is resumed in the fall, to continue this crusade and move that a committee be appointed by this chamber to conduct a thorough investigation into all phases of the situation, with the object of making recommendations that will bring about an all-out attack on this destroying insect by all our forces—scientists, plant pathologists, federal and provincial governments and private industry. To do what? To save a vital Canadian resource, our Eastern forests, so that we may continue to sing, and mean it, "O Canada, we stand on guard for thee!"

Senator Inman: May I ask the honourable senator a question? What are the first signs of the budworm in the trees?

Senator Burchill: The top of the tree is affected first, and then the infestation comes down so that the branches die.

Senator Inman: The tree does not change colour?

Senator Burchill: It turns brown.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I rise to support Senator Burchill in drawing to the attention of Parliament and Canadians the disaster that is occurring in the eastern part of Canada. It can only be termed a disaster. The Atlantic provinces are now affected. The province of Quebec is beginning to suffer very seriously. The northern part of the State of Maine, through which I travelled this past weekend, is in a serious state. Northern Ontario is beginning to see some of the spruce budworm infestation. However, I think that New Brunswick, of all jurisdictions, is at this point in time in the most serious condition.

In New Brunswick we have ten pulp and paper mills, and scores of sawmills and planing mills. The products of the forests are the most important element of the whole economy of New Brunswick. The greatest single employer in New Brunswick is the forest industry, for which many thousands of people work directly, and thousands of others indirectly earn their livelihood from it. As Senator Burchill has said, the total area of New Brunswick is about 28,000 square miles, and 87 per cent of this is forest land. Of that total, 70 per cent of the forested area is coniferous forest. For the most part it is balsam fir, and a close second is spruce, of many species.

Honourable senators, the "little beastie" we are concerned with now is named the spruce budworm, but it hits first the balsam fir, which is the best product we have—in the number of trees, at least. I feel safe in predicting that by this time next year 50 per cent of the coniferous forest of New Brunswick will be dead, and a large additional segment of it will be dying.

I do not know what the answer is. Spraying has been going on since 1952. I was associated with the Government of New Brunswick in the Premier's Office in 1951 when the first tripartite financing arrangement was made, as Senator Burchill said. Under that arrangement the federal government, the provincial government and the forest industries, shared on a three-way basis the cost of the spraying program. The initial spraying was done with DDT, and at that time people were not as aware of the threat to the ecology as they are today. It was an acceptable thing to do. We were not conscious then of what a highly dangerous chemical it was. Its effect, in carrying through the food train, was serious indeed; serious even to humans. It went a long way towards almost wiping out the Atlantic salmon runs on the East Coast. It did not affect the mature salmon greatly, but it had a disastrous effect upon the smolt, the fingerlings and the fry. In some areas, including branches of the famous Miramichi River, we had an almost total wipe-out of salmon smolt, and it has taken many years to recover from that.

DDT, as you know, gets into the bone system as well as the blood and, as the food train follows its way up the echelon, its implant in the structure becomes heavier and heavier. For example, in New Brunswick for a period of years we had to stop the shooting or cropping of woodcock, which is a prized game bird, because its total food supply is earthworms. The woodcock was not directly affected by DDT, but it became dreadfully affected by DDT through eating earthworms. Of course, humans were eating the woodcock and, being third in the food train, were poisoned by DDT. So we backed away from that in the spraying program.

We moved next to phosphamidon, and it was thought to be a safe insecticide. But we found out very quickly that it had disastrous effects on almost all bird life—not just affecting it but killing it. There was an immediate upsurge in insect life. We were killing the budworm, but we were also killing the birds that were helping to kill the budworm.

Honourable senators, I mention these points to illustrate that there is no easy solution. Every solution thus far has proved to be one of early good effects, and bad long term effects. Currently we are working with, I think, the fifth type of insecticide to be used in our spraying program. As Senator Burchill has said, Mr. K. C. Irving, who is the most advanced, thorough and effective person in forestry in the province of New Brunswick, suggested last year that as far as the usefulness of the sprays now in current use are concerned, we might just as well be using dishwater. I concur completely in that.

Last year the infestation took on new proportions, and the damage was severe. This year, after the very heavy spraying of many millions of acres, the damage is absolutely disastrous. The infestation broke out in the northern and northeastern parts of the province, and it gradually spread down through the whole province. Not only has it spread into Nova Scotia, but it has spread into Maine and Quebec. It now affects the whole of my province. During the last ten days I have driven approximately 150 miles to the northeast of Fredericton, and no matter where I turned the devastation was absolute. It is one of the saddest sights I have seen in New Brunswick. That great green forest is turning first red, then brown and when it reaches the grey—much of it is already grey—you know the forest is dead.

Senator Rowe: I wonder if Senator McElman would permit a question at this point. He spoke of this wholesale devastation. Is he referring wholly and entirely to the spruce budworm or is he including other pests in what he says? I was wondering about the woolly aphid which caused such devastation to the forests of Newfoundland. Is that an infestation as well at this time?

Senator McElman: Not to the same degree, Senator Rowe. I am referring only at this point to infestation by the spruce budworm. It would seem that in Eastern Canada—I do not know about the rest of the continent—we are now acquiring a pest or a disease for every tree we have in the forest. The great elms of Eastern Canada over the last 15 years have been stricken by Dutch elm disease. My own city of Fredericton, the provincial capital, is known as the “city of stately elms.” Fredericton has acquired that title over the years because of its scores of thousands of elm trees. We lost about 25 per cent of our elm trees to that disease. Fortunately methods were found to combat it rather effectively, and I think we have it beaten.

In the past five years we have discovered another little weevil, or bug, that is attacking the maple and the various types of birch. The disease is commonly referred to as birch dieback or maple dieback. The attack comes first at the crown of the tree, and works its way down. A good part of the hardwood forest is now dying. Another worm is attacking the white pine, and other species of pine. To the best of my knowledge, the only trees of any commercial significance in Eastern Canada today that are not affected by an infestation of some type or another are the hemlock and the tamarack, both of which are rather secondary in the forest products field. However, that is aside from the point raised by Senator Burchill, with respect to the spruce budworm.

I spoke of travelling to the northeastern part of the province and the dreadful devastation by the budworm that I saw in that area. I also travelled 75 miles to the south of Fredericton. The picture there is exactly the same. During the past weekend, I drove 75 miles northwest of Fredericton, and again the picture is identical. All the forest is turning red and brown, which means that next year it will be grey—dead. I went 300 miles south in the State of Maine. The first 100 to 125 miles showed exactly the same picture.

Senator Burchill is quite correct in suggesting that when we return in the fall we should prosecute this matter to the limit. The federal authority at this point in time can do nothing. They were most shortsighted in not participating in the cost of the spraying program this year. However, they should be given full marks for the tremendous amount of scientific research they have done. They have allocated great resources, not only in terms of dollars but in terms of human resources, in trying to find a truly effective remedy, but, nonetheless, it was most shortsighted of them this year to have withdrawn from the program.

It seems to me that, although the provinces have the initial responsibility for protecting their forests, the federal authority does draw revenue from the forest industries and thus should share some of the responsibilities. As I said, we have ten pulp and paper mills in the province of New Brunswick, and the federal government draws tremendous amounts of money from those forest industries by way of corporation income tax. It seems only proper and appropriate, therefore, that the federal government, in a disastrous situation of this kind, should spend a large part of that money to help fight the attack being made upon our forests by the spruce budworm.

Although, as I have said, the primary responsibility for the protection of the forests lies with each province concerned, the situation we face now is so widespread—covering five provinces as well as the State of Maine—that the responsibility can no longer be considered merely provincial. This is no longer merely an interprovincial or national matter; it has become an international matter in its scope. Surely the various governmental authorities should now come together to determine the best means of combatting this outbreak.

There is one other suggestion, and one only, that I should like to make at this time. In my opinion, rather than standing idly by watching tremendous reserves of forest products go to waste over the next year, the federal and provincial governments should reach some agreement on the immediate cropping of the affected areas. During the next year the greater part of the affected area could be cropped for mature wood for the long lumber industry—the planing mill industry. This could be of tremendous benefit, because we are expecting an upturn in the residential housing industry, with a consequent improvement in the market for lumber. I stress that we have one year in which to obtain the long lumber from the infested area. Beyond that, we can forget about long lumber. On the other hand, we have two years in which to crop the infested areas for pulpwood. If these areas are cropped and the wood is stockpiled, the wood will last. If the trees are left standing in the forests, they will simply rot.

For these reasons it seems obvious to me that the federal authority should at this point in time act as a co-ordinating authority to get the fullest and best use from this product before the rot sets in. We should begin stockpiling the wood. Since the provinces are not in a position to do so, the federal authority should provide the financial resources to enable the stockpiling of this product, both for long lumber and for pulpwood, so that there will not be the tremendous waste that will otherwise occur.

I join Senator Burchill in stressing that there is need for action—immediate action—both for the short term and the longer term. In the longer term, if this infestation is permitted to run its course—as some ecologists suggest should happen—the consequences will be terrible. In New Brunswick we have ten pulp and paper mills, and scores of sawmills and planing mills, which employ thousands upon thousands of workers. Within three years those workers will be sitting on their duffs drawing welfare, and the federal government will pay the shot in any event.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with Senator Burchill in calling attention to this important problem which, as we have heard from what both he and Senator McElman have said, is by no means limited to the damage being done in the province of New Brunswick. The infestation has already spread, and is continuing to spread, to adjacent areas.

It is a good many years since my own family was in the lumber business, but for more than 25 years now I have been going regularly into the woods of New Brunswick—into an area which I suspect is not far from the area referred to by Senator Burchill and Senator McElman. Over that time I have observed the spraying of DDT. That insecticide seemed at first to be the answer for controlling the spruce budworm but, as has been related to us, unhappily it had adverse side effects on the salmon stocks and stocks of other small fish. As Senator McElman pointed out, through its indirect effects DDT is dangerous to birds and other species of wildlife.

While it is regrettable that the federal government has this year withdrawn from the co-operative arrangement for spraying, nevertheless, there is still a great deal to be learned about the medium-term, and certainly the long-term, effectiveness of spraying as against other methods of control. Therefore, we should urge the federal authorities to give leadership in preserving this great natural resource which is certainly being threatened—and which may be threatened truly disastrously—by the spruce budworm infestations.

Surely in the areas of research and co-ordination among the provinces and the industrial users of the forests of our country, the federal government can give necessary and effective leadership. This is a serious matter, and we should give our whole attention to it in order to find a solution. It certainly appears from what has been said here this afternoon, and from what many other honourable senators know from their own experience, that we do not have much time left to deal with the problem. A delay of a few years may allow our forest resources to be damaged to such an extent that it will take generations to overcome.

I hope we will not be found wanting in giving of our attention to, or in the allocation of the necessary resources to deal with, this distressing matter.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I too should like to support the points which have been made here today, and I congratulate Senator Burchill on taking the initiative in this matter. The first time I ever heard Senator Burchill speak in this chamber, which was about three and a half years ago, he was speaking on a matter of similar importance—the fate of the Atlantic salmon. I think it is rather interesting that we should hear him again today speaking on behalf of a great Canadian natural resource, and particularly, of course, a resource of Eastern Canada.

● (1500)

We have heard of the conditions that exist in New Brunswick as a result of this problem. As has been pointed out, it is not confined to that province, but affects other provinces as well. I have a little property in the country, about 25 miles from St. John's, which is, in a sense, a small wilderness. On that property, originally, were to be found about half the indigenous trees of Newfoundland. Over the years I have managed to acquire all the others, and so I do have, within the confines of a few acres, every tree that is indigenous to the island of Newfoundland, and possibly to the entire province, because I believe there is no tree that grows in Labrador that does not also grow on the island of Newfoundland. I have therefore seen, in a small way, the depredations that are being made by this pest.

I was very interested in what Senator McElman had to say when he was speaking about the budworm, and the damage it has caused. In addition to this, we have also suffered tremendous damage from the woolly aphid, which attacks our balsam firs, one of the two great paper-making trees of Canada—the other being the black spruce.

Here we have an interrelationship and an interaction of one problem with others. A few years ago the paper companies, and other responsible parties, discontinued using DDT, as pointed out by Senator Burchill, and started to use another chemical which they felt would be less harmful to other forms of life, especially birds and fish. This new insecticide was heavily used over certain areas of Newfoundland, and we were told by responsible persons—scientists, entomologists and others—that this insecticide was not going to do any harm to other forms of life in that province. I do not think they have ever conceded that it did harm, but I know from first-hand observation that the following year there was a tremendous decline in birdlife in Newfoundland.

I understand there is the problem of trying to control these dangerous infestations and, at the same time, protecting other forms of life. I happen to have a very good grove of mountain ash that is annually attacked by the saw-fly larvae which, overnight, can denude a tree, or a large portion of it. I found, over the years, that the one thing that could control that situation was DDT, and so routinely, two or three times during the summer, I would apply that chemical to those trees. We were then told we had to stop using DDT, for reasons that are well known, and another insecticide was recommended, which I used and which, according to my observations, the saw-fly larvae enjoyed so much that far from dying, they appeared to multiply. I almost lost my mountain ash. I have now found a cure for this pest, but I will not go into that now.

The point that Senator McElman made is one which I think needs to be kept in mind. Apparently every one of our major species of trees is being attacked in one way or another. The birch in Newfoundland has been attacked in recent years, for example, and I dare say this infestation was there a hundred years ago. What Senator McElman calls a tamarack we call locally a juniper, which I take is the same as our larch. I feel sure the tamarack Senator McElman was speaking of is the larch. However, the larch is attacked routinely, and a few years ago most of the larch trees of Newfoundland were destroyed. As it happens, larch is not too important a commercial species at the present time, but none of these trees is valueless, and we cannot afford to lose large numbers of any kind of tree.

I therefore come to my main point, which of course has already been made by other speakers, that the problem we are concerned with here is a national one, and possibly even an international one. It is not one that a province like New Brunswick or Newfoundland can be expected to control by itself. It calls, as Senator Hicks has indicated, for the co-ordination of all our resources. We must pool our scientific knowledge of all kinds and set up programs of experimentation, and so on, because we are not dealing simply with the problem of the loss of the spruce or the fir; we are dealing with a multitude of problems which are all interrelated.

This is becoming increasingly serious because in Eastern Canada we are seeing a depletion of our other resources. Hardly a year goes by without one of our mines having to close down because it is depleted. All of these mines are finite. Some may last 20 or 30 years, but they are finite. Our fisheries are being depleted also. Whatever the reason may be, the point is that the fish are no longer there on the East Coast of Canada in the quantities we were accustomed to a few years ago. This affects the livelihood of tens of thousands, indeed hundreds of thousands, of people in Eastern Canada.

On the island of Newfoundland we have two of the largest paper mills in the world. One of them has already been shut down for several weeks this year because of market conditions and the economics of harvesting wood. In Newfoundland, every acre that is destroyed by the spruce budworm, the woolly aphid or any other insect or pest, means that the problem of converting wood into paper in a competitive way is intensified.

I therefore support what the previous speakers have said. This is not a provincial problem; this is something that calls for the co-ordination and application of all the resources of Canada.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I would just say that the house should be made aware of the fact that the spruce budworm is extremely liberal, with a small "l", in its choice of provinces, and that it is just as much a problem on the West Coast as it is on the East Coast. It is a very serious problem indeed.

Senator Grosart: It certainly is Liberal if it is a problem everywhere.

Senator Perrault: We expected that from the loyal Opposition.

I think Senator Burchill, Senator McElman, Senator Hicks and Senator Rowe have made a real contribution this afternoon in bringing the spruce budworm crisis to the attention of the government. I make this commitment: I shall make available to my Cabinet colleagues all of the worthwhile presentations made in the Senate this afternoon on this important subject. I do so with a special interest because I come from a province where more than 50 cents out of every dollar of the provincial wealth, directly or indirectly, comes from its forests. So I think I appreciate the deep concern expressed here this afternoon.

I shall certainly bring this matter to the attention of my colleagues in the Cabinet. I hope that something can be done.

Hon. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words in support of Senator Burchill.

This year that most beautiful province of all, Prince Edward Island, has turned brown instead of green, because the spruce is a native tree there and somehow or other the spruce budworm got across the water to that province. I am scared to think that we are going to have no trees at all left in another two years.

Senator Flynn: Do not ask for a causeway, then.

Senator Bonnell: We will not ask for a causeway. All we want to do is try to keep the spruce budworm in New Brunswick, and out of Prince Edward Island. Nevertheless, it is over there.

In addition to losing our spruce forests, we are liable to lose our wildlife because it needs the forests for its protection. The grouse and pheasant, and all other wildlife in the province, are going to be affected by the damage that is being done. I sometimes wonder whether the new substances we spray on the roads in the winter—the chloride, and so on—are destroying the birds, and whether we are, as a result, destroying the balance of nature. In any case, our province this year has gone brown. It is not brown from drought; it is brown from the spruce budworm.

I believe the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture should take a trip to Eastern Canada, and see at first hand how serious the problem is. Perhaps there should be a federal-provincial conference of the ministers of agriculture on this matter which is of such great concern.

● (1510)

I congratulate Senator Burchill on bringing this to the attention of the Senate. I hope he has brought it to the attention of the nation, and to the attention of every ministry concerned with forestry across the country, and that they in turn will act to co-ordinate their policies in this regard immediately.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, might I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would inquire about a situation which I have observed in the province of Quebec? Perhaps I am misinformed, but I understand that the federal government had arranged for some spraying in Quebec, but after a while decided to stop. I understand that this happened in the spring. I do not know if this was due to a misunderstanding between the federal and provincial authorities or to a lack of co-operation, or something else of that nature, but I do know that some operations were originally conducted by the federal authorities and then were stopped in the early spring.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my intention to endeavour to obtain a reply to that question, and to a number of others posed here this afternoon. If it is the wish of the Senate I shall prepare a report on the problem, which I shall give to the house, if possible, within a few days.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, for many years I have had a tremendous admiration for one of the senior members of this chamber, Senator Burchill, and this afternoon he gave me, and all of us, one further valid reason why we should continue to admire him for his courage and his energy.

This afternoon he brought to the attention of this house and, indeed, to the attention of the nation, a problem of great magnitude. Perhaps it is his modesty which influences him to suggest that perhaps we should wait until the fall to find a solution to this vast problem. In my view, if we were to wait until the fall, we would then be waiting much too long.

As was mentioned here this afternoon by Senator Burchill and others, the problem is really urgent because every day, every hour—indeed, every minute—thousands of dollars' worth of trees are going down the drain in the eastern provinces of Canada, and in New Brunswick in particular, and we cannot continue to suffer such losses any longer. It is all very well to say that DDT damaged the ecology. It did, and spraying with DDT had to be stopped or practically stopped in the late 1960s.

At that time I was involved in the provincial government, and I remember that the industry itself was contributing one-third of the cost of budworm spraying, with the provincial government and the federal government each contributing one-third. The federal government decided to stop its part of the financing of this activity in the province of New Brunswick. I was furious, and came to Ottawa at the time to request the federal government to continue the spraying, but to no avail. For our own part, we continued with the spraying as much as possible. As was mentioned by Senator Burchill, we are now experiencing the worst year in history so far as budworm activity is concerned, and I for one am not willing to stand idly by and wait until the fall to find a solution to the problem.

I was delighted to hear the Leader of the Government in the Senate saying words to the effect that he will draw this to the attention of the government immediately. I hope he does so, honourable senators, because I say to him, as I say to you, that this is a most urgent problem. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Quebec cannot afford this loss. It is a loss that is taking place very day. As Senator Rowe mentioned, if I understood him correctly, this is a renewable resource as compared to resources such as minerals which are finite. But it is only renewable as long as our chemists and scientists find a solution to this problem, and the finding of this solution is very urgent.

I again commend Senator Burchill for having brought this to the attention of the Senate, but I would ask him to bear in mind that it is now that we have to take action; not in the fall. I welcome the fact that the leader is going to have discussions with members of the federal Cabinet, and I hope that he will be successful. If he is not, then this matter should be thoroughly debated in the Senate. Senator Bonnell had a good idea when he suggested that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture should visit the infested areas of these provinces. Even if it were just a short trip, it might help us to realize the importance and urgency of the problem.

On motion of Senator Michaud, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SCIENCE POLICY

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Lamontagne, Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, presented the first report of the committee and asked that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, pp. 1171-1173.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I wish to point out that members of the committee who were at the meeting this morning will note that the new terms of reference which the committee is seeking have been included in the report instead of being presented as a separate motion, so as to simplify procedure.

I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, July 14, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

● (1410)

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give a word of explanation. In moving the adjournment until Monday night at 8 o'clock, I have taken into consideration the legislation now before us and that which should reach us by Monday evening. We have received this afternoon Bill C-50, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and it is expected that when we return on Monday Bill C-8, to establish a national petroleum company, will also have reached us.

By Tuesday we should receive Bill C-66, to amend the Excise Tax Act. In addition to the foregoing, a number of committee meetings have been scheduled for next week. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has scheduled a meeting for Tuesday at 10 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will continue its advance study of the bankruptcy bill on Wednesday morning at 9.30. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 11 a.m. Tuesday and at 3.30 p.m. on Wednesday and Thursday.

It is expected that the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy will meet on Tuesday and Thursday of next week at a time still to be determined. It is hoped, with this schedule of work in mind, that Parliament will be able to adjourn for the summer recess by Thursday evening next.

Senator Asselin: What about the coin bill?

Senator Langlois: Hopefully we will have it.

Senator Perrault: It is possible.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Langlois for informing the Senate of what is expected of us next week, the last week of Parliament. He has mentioned only one bill that might come from the other place.

Senator Langlois: Two bills.

Senator Flynn: Two bills?

Senator Langlois: Bill C-8 and Bill C-66.

Senator Flynn: Bill C-8 and Bill C-66. I would like to know if there are any other bills the government considers must be passed before Parliament adjourns for the summer recess. If there are only these two bills, then we can expect the Senate will deal with them in time to adjourn for the summer recess next Thursday, as Senator Langlois has mentioned. But it seems to me that the order of business in the other place is much heavier than that. Of course, if the government is going to react to the Opposition as it did in the case of the Olympic "gold coin" bill, and withdraw a bill because someone objects to some aspect of it, then we could possibly adjourn as soon as next Tuesday. Therefore, I think it would be in the interests of the Senate to know the attitude of the government with regard to the other pieces of legislation which the President of the Privy Council considers must be passed before the summer recess can start.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to assure the Leader of the Opposition that the schedule outlined by the Deputy Leader of the Government is tentative and based on estimates to this time. However, if it is demonstrated in the other place that a spirit of amity and goodwill prevails and that it is possible to obtain the kind of cooperation to expedite legislation clearly beneficial to all the people of Canada, then there may be other legislation coming from there to this place in the next few days—and it may well include the "gold coin" legislation.

Senator Flynn: Of course, with a few amendments and some cooperation on the part of the government, much legislation could be passed.

Senator Perrault: I simply wish to point out to the Leader of the Opposition that the debate in the other place with respect to the Olympic coins was really an exercise in Olympian endurance and there should be an effort to reach the finish line in record time.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not think there is any call for Senator Perrault's getting all worked up. If the government refuses to proceed with legislation unless the Opposition is totally in agreement with every aspect of a bill, then what we have there is an abdication of responsibility. If the Opposition, here or in the other place, does not endeavour to improve legislation by criticizing it, which is its duty, then it is not worthwhile for Parliament to sit at any time of the year, either in January or in July.

Senator Perrault: The honourable Leader of the Opposition will agree, however, as one who has served with distinction in government, that at some point the majority opinion in this country must prevail.

Senator Asselin: Then why not take a vote?

Senator Flynn: Not when it means obtaining the consent of Parliament in a few hours with respect to any ill-prepared bills. And that has too often been the case since the beginning of this session.

Motion agreed to.

VICTORIA MEMORIAL MUSEUM

RUMOURED CHANGE OF NAME—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on June 10 of this year a question was asked in this house by the Honourable Senator Forsey with respect to the Victoria Memorial Museum. I have sought an opportunity to reply in the presence of Senator Forsey in the chamber. However, because of the possible approaching end of our activities prior to adjournment I feel I should answer this question today. The question was asked regarding the rumour of the removal of the word "Victoria" from the name of the museum at the foot of Melcalfe Street in this city of Ottawa. I would now like to offer the following explanation.

The term Victoria Memorial Museum is misleading in that no such museum now exists, but it can be used as a descriptive title for the building itself. Thus, for example, it can be said that the Victoria Memorial Museum Building now houses the National Museum of Man and the National Museum of Natural Sciences.

The title carved in stone on the building is not in the two official languages of the country, as is now the requirement when federal buildings are identified, but to remove it or to attempt its duplication in French would alter the architectural character of an historical structure. In the circumstances, it is proposed to leave the carved stone title without alteration, but to place adjacent to the building a national historic site marker giving in English and French the history of the building, a brief description of the use to which it is now put, and an explanation of the title.

As yet, there has been no opportunity to determine the feasibility of this plan by consultation with the National Historic Parks and Sites Branch and other authorities involved, so that the project remains at the proposal stage until this can be done.

I hope that this information will be to the satisfaction of Senator Forsey and other interested senators.

THE CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NEWSPAPER REPORT—PRIVILEGE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the orders of the day, I should like to raise a question of privilege.

In a report published in La Presse of Montreal dated June 27, 1975 on page D11, we find the following item entitled:

Senator Langlois denounces the CBC in which I read the following paragraph:

While leaving the Senate, Mr. Langlois stated that the president of the central committee of the CNTU was swearing like a trooper during a televised interview on the CBC.

I wish to point out to the house that I do not use such vocabulary. Perhaps Mr. Chartrand does, but I have never spoken such words.

UNITED NATIONS

CONFERENCE ON CRIME PREVENTION—STATUS OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AS PARTICIPANTS—QUESTION

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I address a question to the Leader of the Government. A number of newspaper reports have indicated that the government seems to have some hesitation in banning from this country members of the international terrorist organization known as the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) in connection with the forthcoming United Nations Conference on Crime Prevention in Toronto.

Will the leader tell us if this matter has been resolved, and what the government's position is?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, while it had been hoped that a statement on this important subject would be available from the government today, it is the government's intention to make known its position next week.

I can only say that this has been the subject of a great deal of discussion on the part of members of cabinet and of the government, and it is my considered view that the final decision made by the government will be to the satisfaction of the great majority of Canadians.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT, NO. 2

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-53, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, No. 2.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I cannot understand why the government has presented two bills dealing with essentially similar problems of farmers.

Last March, Bill C-10 was passed, providing an increase to the producer in advance payments in respect of grain to be delivered under a permit book. This legislation encourages farmers to sell through the Canadian Wheat Board, which was assigned the responsibility of administering this act. It should be noted that the original act was sponsored by the Diefenbaker government 18 years ago and has been popular with the farming population.

Bill C-53 is a further amendment to the original act and is in reality a follow-up of Bill C-10. The sponsor of the bill now before us, Senator Molgat, gave a lucid explanation of this new piece of legislation, for which I should like to commend him. He comes from a prosperous farming community in Manitoba and therefore has a thorough knowledge of the problems of agriculture as well as of the producer.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: Thank you.

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Yuzyk: This second amendment to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act embodied in Bill C-53 has two parts. First, it raises by two and a half times the maximum advance which a producer may obtain to finance the drying of tough or damp grain, or with respect to unthreshed grain—wheat, oats and barley. The maximum is set at the lesser of 25 cents per bushel or $1,500 for the drying of grain, and $7,500 for unthreshed grain.

The second part of the bill authorizes payment to the Wheat Board of a portion of the producer's receipts for grain delivered to a licensed elevator. The off-board sales would be credited to cover outstanding cash advances made by the Canadian Wheat Board.

Both of those amendments were endorsed by all parties in the other place.

As it did with respect to Bill C-10, the Opposition in the Senate welcomes and approves Bill C-53, regarding it as a good piece of legislation which will be of great benefit to farmers. It comes at the right time to be effective for the coming harvest, and will therefore be of use when it will be needed the most this year.

From the experience of past years, we know that the situation is especially aggravated in a harvest year when quotas are such that the grain cannot be delivered for drying, and farmers thus become short of cash. If the grain is not threshed, the farmer can lose most of his crop after it is covered by snow. If he proceeds to harvest the grain when it is damp, he can save the crop but he still has the problem of drying it, which is a costly proposition. With the former limit of 10 cents a bushel, it would not be possible to cover adequately the cost of drying damp grain, because the price of drying is constantly and rapidly increasing. The 25-cent limit per bushel extended to a maximum of $1,500, as allowed in this bill will undoubtedly be appreciated by the farmers as will the maximum of $7,500 for unthreshed grain, over which the farmer has no control because he is the unfortunate victim of weather conditions. I believe that these amendments will go a long way to help stabilize grain production on the Prairies.

In connection with the obvious benefits of this bill, some questions come to my mind. One is that if the producer can now pay his advance through deliveries of wheat, oats and barley, why can't this policy be extended to include rye, flax and rapeseed? Why shouldn't these grains come within the scope of this legislation with respect to advances on unthreshed grain and to finance the drying of damp grain? Has this problem not been raised by the producers?

And now some technical questions for the purpose of clarification. In the fifth line of clause 5, which amends section 11(1), it states:

—manager or operator of an elevator authorized to purchase grain for the Board or other person receiving delivery of the grain—

Are these elevators not authorized to purchase grain for the board? Who is the "other person receiving delivery of the grain," if it is not an elevator? In a few lines further on, new words are added twice to the present act, as follows: "... payment, as the case may be." Why the insertion of this phrase? Is this a legalistic precision which I do not understand?

Next, a question regarding the maximum cash advance for any individual. Does the $15,000 maximum include the $7,500 for unthreshed grain and the $1,500 for drying costs? Are these advances supplied by the Canadian Wheat Board or by the government? Who pays the defaults and the interest charges?

I have posed a number of questions and could ask others, particularly about wheat sales and prices. I believe that it would be useful to refer the bill to committee where a senior official of the department responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board should be present to give explanations.

We on the Opposition side give full approval to Bill C-53 and will vote for its passage after due consideration and proper study in committee.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

● (1430)

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I thank my colleague from Manitoba, Senator Yuzyk, for his very useful comments on this bill. Certainly, I would be prepared to move that the bill be referred to committee if that is the wish of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: And of the committee itself?

Senator Molgat: However, I would hope that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture would meet soon to consider the matter. I understand from the chairman of that committee that it could be dealt with this coming Tuesday.

Senator Argue: At 10 o'clock in the morning.

Senator Molgat: I think that would be useful, because although there is by no means a deadline there is a desirable timing, which is August 1, the beginning of the crop year. If we could do that, I believe it would serve the purposes of honourable senators and the agricultural community in Western Canada, who are concerned about this bill.

Senator Yuzyk raised some very valid questions, and if the bill goes to committee we can have explanations from the departmental staff responsible. Perhaps I could just touch on a couple of his questions. He asked about rye flax and rapeseed. It is my understanding that these have been considered for possible inclusion, but there is a difference here in that there is, and has been over the years, an open market situation for these crops, which meant that they were not in the same situation as wheat, oats and barley, which were restricted under the Wheat Board. With the opportunity to sell under an open market situation, there did not seem to be the same demand for advance payments. However, I think this is something that could be considered in committee.

It is my understanding that advances actually come in a mixed sort of way. Senator McNamara, who is a former chief commissioner of the Wheat Board, could probably explain this much better than I can. The Wheat Board actually makes the advances. However, as I am sure honourable senators from the West are aware, all Wheat Board costs of financing and administration are paid for by the Wheat Board, and hence by the Prairie grain growers. In this case, the Wheat Board advances the money but then charges back to the Government of Canada the interest chargeable to that specific item of advance. That is the only item of subsidy that comes from the national treasury. The Wheat Board does the administration, the Wheat Board advances the money, and the only item from the national treasury is the interest portion, which is not a heavy one.

Senator Yuzyk: How about those payments that are in default? Is this taken care of by the Wheat Board or is this charged to the government? I understand, of course, that these defaults have been very minor, and indeed negligible, because I believe about 99.99 per cent of farmers have paid up whatever they owed.

Senator Molgat: I regret that I cannot give a specific answer to that question on the default portion, whether it comes from the Wheat Board or from the Government of Canada. I am sure my colleague Senator McNamara could reply to that. It would be my expectation that, in view of the fact that the interest is covered by the Government of Canada, the defaults would be covered.

In order to put this in proper perspective, perhaps I should give the figures. Yesterday I was asked a question about the defaults by Senator Buckwold, and I then said my information was that about 99.99 per cent of the farmers had paid. That is the fact over most years. In total, if it is averaged out, the figure would probably be something like 99 per cent.

The total of the advances over the years since the inception of the program in 1957 is $1,124 million, and the total default at this stage—or, at least, the total outstanding unrepaid—is $16 million. So you have to relate $16 million to $1,100 million. Of that $16 million, slightly less than $14 million is outstanding in this current year. In other words, over the whole program, apart from this year, the total default has amounted to about $2.4 million which, in relation to the total, is almost negligible. It is not, by any means, a large amount. The $16 million outstanding now is largely related to the outstanding advances for this particular crop year, and if it has not been repaid it is simply because the grain has not been delivered.

Senator Argue: It is being delivered now.

Senator Molgat: Yes, it is in process of delivery now, because the crop year will end on July 31.

Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Manning asked why there are two acts. Senator Yuzyk also referred to this. I simply cannot tell you why two acts are necessary. All I know is that the first act, Bill C-10, was passed by the House of Commons and subsequently by the Senate, and it increased the limit from $6,000 to $15,000.

Senator Flynn: Inefficient administration is the answer.

Senator Molgat: My honourable colleague says it is because of inefficient administration. Possibly one may look at it in another way, and say it is because of receptive administration. I suspect what happened is that in the course of discussions about the changes, the government found there was a request from the producers. In the normal action of the present government—

Senator Flynn: It is the normal attitude of the present government to see things only afterwards.

Senator Molgat: The government has listened to the producers, and has agreed with their submission that other things ought to be changed as well, and so brought in a second bill. I would think this is a commendable action, showing that the government is not taking an inflexible position.

Senator Flynn: Bravo. I hope the government will do that all the time.

Senator Argue: There may have to be a third one.

Senator Molgat: There may, indeed. If, in its discussions in the future, the government finds it necessary, we may have a third act. But for the moment the bill now before us is a definite improvement, as Senator Yuzyk has pointed out.

Senator Langlois: The Opposition is against improvement all the time.

Senator Perrault: They go against the grain, too.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I hope that these explanations have cleared up at least some of the immediate problems. The details can be explained in committee. I shall be pleased to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture for consideration, but I hope that it will be reported back to the house within a reasonable time. I do not in any way wish to rush the committee's examination, but I remind them that the crop year ends on July 31.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Molgat moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Ac., 1972".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Senator Perrault: Stand.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government why he is standing this order at this particular time? We have been told that we shall have a fairly heavy program next week. There will be at least three bills, and there is pious hope that we will have at least one other and possibly more. If it is the intention of the Senate to dispose of the pre-summer recess business of Parliament next week—and, personally, I have doubts about that—it would seem that we should be proceeding at once with the bill now before us. It was introduced on Tuesday, and it is on the Order Paper for second reading today. Surely, we should be dealing with it so that we will know what the presentation is to be on second reading.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, the leader is standing this order at my request, because I have undertaken to explain the bill on second reading.

If my honourable colleagues on the other side have had an opportunity to look at Bill C-57 they will realize that the Income Tax Act, by comparison, looks like a verse from «Dick and Jane.» Bill C-57 is probably one of the most complicated and significant pieces of legislation in the fiscal area that we have had before us for some time. Frankly, I am not prepared to attempt to explain this bill to this chamber without having at least a rudimentary knowledge of what its import is.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Lang: I have been unable to obtain a briefing from the Department of Finance today. The people in the department were either at meetings or otherwise unavailable. I have requested that they attend upon me tomorrow in Toronto, however, and they have agreed to do so. That is the explanation, Senator Grosart.

Senator Grosart: I have every sympathy with Senator Lang, but I point out that this bill has been available to parliamentarians, and specifically to anyone who might be assigned the sponsorship of it, for quite a long time. It is not a new bill.

Senator Flynn: In any event, having read the bill, I am quite sure that Senator Lang will not be able to understand it any better on Monday next than today.

Order stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE (TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, for the second reading of the Bill S-23, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment)".—(Honourable Senator Prowse).

Senator Prowse: Stand.

Senator Flynn: Is Senator Prowse not ready yet?

Order Stands.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion, in amendment, of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Norrie, to the motion of the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Stand.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, by comparison with Senator Prowse, at least I explained yesterday why I am standing this item.

Senator Langlois: You are not ready yet.

Senator Flynn: Oh, I am ready.

Order stands.

FORESTRY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Burchill calling the attention of the Senate to acceleration in the devastation of the forests of Eastern Canada and adjoining areas by the ravages of the spruce budworm.

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Burchill called the attention of this house to a matter of utmost importance to the economy of the province of New Brunswick. I refer to the impending disaster in the forest lands of New Brunswick which are at present suffering a terrible infestation of budworms. As a senator from that province I welcome this opportunity, in conjunction with those who have preceded me in this debate, to support Senator Burchill's position that the attention of this house should be focused on this urgent matter.

In dealing with the subject matter yesterday, various speakers confined themselves to the broader aspects of the problem—the overall picture. They dealt in broad terms with the menace threatening the New Brunswick lumber industry, the crown land holdings and forest lands generally. It is not my intention to expound on that general aspect, because what needs to be said on it was said yesterday. But I do feel that it is appropriate for me to attempt to draw your attention to a more specific aspect of the situation—that is, as it applies to the smallholdings, to the woodlot situation, and as it affects the economy of the small farmer who depends on the income from his woodlot for his subsistence.

In the course of his remarks yesterday Senator McElman mentioned that 87 per cent of the area of New Brunswick lies under forest. You may be interested to know that a breakdown of the forested land of New Brunswick by ownership class reveals that 44.4 per cent of it is provincial crown land; 2.2 per cent is federal crown land; private holdings of over 500 acres each account for 22.2 per cent of the area; and 31.2 per cent of the area is privately owned by the small farmers of the province and by the owners of small woodlots who are dependent, as I have indicated, on the income from those woodlots for at least a part, if not all, of their livelihood.

When it is considered that that 31.2 per cent of the forests of New Brunswick is under threat of disaster, it becomes readily apparent that Senator Burchill deserves credit for having brought the matter to the attention of this house, and for having demonstrated the need for governments at all levels to deal immediately with this urgent situation.

● (1450)

If we look at it from another point of view, as a percentage comparison of inventory volumes by ownership class, we find that 31.2 per cent, representing the small woodlots of the province of New Brunswick, constitutes 23.6 per cent of all the species in quantity figures. It would seem that the larger holdings are more productive, acrewise, than the small acreages. Therefore, 23.6 per cent of all the wood produced in New Brunswick is produced by the owner-operators of small woodlots.

There is a second aspect which, I submit, deserves our attention as well, from the point of view of the small woodlot owner, and that is the Christmas tree industry. The Christmas tree industry also has real importance, and is of great significance in the economy of the small farmers.

All those who are familiar with the situation as it exists in New Brunswick know very well that in the fall of the year, during September, October and November, there is great activity throughout the rural areas of the province where Christmas tree buyers and operators carry on their activities. Many people are involved in these operations, and many smallholders have the opportunity to benefit from this trade by selling Christmas trees to the buyers during this period.

Honourable senators, those are the two points which I wanted to bring to the attention of the house at this time, namely, the importance of the lumber industry to the many small farmers and woodlot owners in New Brunswick, who derive an important part of their income from those woodlots, and also the importance of the Christmas tree industry to those who depend on it for their livelihood.

With those two considerations in mind, in addition to the many others presented yesterday, I am very happy indeed to have had this opportunity of supporting the views expressed by Senator Burchill when he stressed the urgency of finding ways and means to solve the terrible disaster which has fallen upon the woodlands of the province of New Brunswick.

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Michaud: Certainly.

Senator Buckwold: I think all of us have been impressed with the extent of what could be a provincial disaster in New Brunswick. I must say, coming from the West, that I was not aware of what was going on in this essential industry, this foundation industry, of that province. My question is: In view of the dimension of the problem, what action has the Government of New Brunswick taken to meet the challenge of this disaster? I do not think that has been explained to us. I do not suppose the provincial government has been sitting back and letting it happen. There must be an explanation.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to comment.

The provincial government, irrespective of party, has been conducting spraying operations with insecticide since 1952. For a good number of the past 24 years the spraying operation has covered as many as 5 million acres of forest land—in fact, I think it has covered an area greater than that. The spraying has been going on every year over that period. Unfortunately, the effect of the spray in the last couple of years appears to be minimal, and this is the cause of the disaster. It is not something that can be attributed to, or blamed on, anybody. Governments have been doing the best they can to deal with the problem, but the efforts they have been making in the last two years in particular just do not seem to be having the desired effect.

Senator Buckwold: I think we are aware that the government has been spraying. It has been pointed out to us that this has been going on for a long time, although it is basically ineffective. A crisis of a particularly intense nature, however, seems to have developed just in the last year or two, and I thought that there probably ought to be more reaction from the province, and other steps taken. I am not in any way minimizing the federal role, which I agree should be very active, but I cannot imagine the province's not rigorously pursuing every remedy that may be available to it.

Senator Langlois: Any worthwhile reaction comes from the Senate, and it did this time too.

Senator McElman: The suggestion that they have not done anything effective is quite wrong. They have indeed done something very effective. If that spraying had not been done, even as a holding action to keep the forests alive, the coniferous forests of New Brunswick would have been dead 20 years ago. The ten pulp and paper mills, and all the lumber mills, in New Brunswick would have been closed many years ago. To suggest, therefore, that nothing effective has been done is entirely wrong. It has been a holding action. I cannot recall anybody suggesting at any point in time that the budworm was going to be knocked out completely, but the forest has been kept alive, the industry has been kept alive, and employment for many thousands of New Brunswickers has been kept alive.

As a matter of fact, the federal scientists primarily, in collaboration with the provincial experts, have been engaged in research over all those years, and they have not yet come up with the answer. One solution has been found—a rather radical solution—but it has not yet become a practical answer in terms of economics. This solution is based upon the sexual activity of the budworm, strange as it may sound.

An Hon. Senator: Describe.

Senator McElman: I will describe it. A chemical has been developed which can cause the male moth that comes from the budworm to become rather excited in its procreative activities in advance of the will and the wish of the female, which causes it to perform its functions at a time when they are not productive. This has been successful in the laboratory.

Senator Bourget: Is this a federal or a provincial project?

Senator McElman: I can laugh with you. However, this approach has not been brought into the practical field as yet, in spite of its success in the laboratory. Efforts are continually being made, and this is one of them.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Deschatelets, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, July 14, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1164)

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE ON SCIENCE POLICY

Thursday, July 10, 1975.

The Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy makes its first report as follows:

On November 21, 1974, the Senate approved a motion which read in part:

"That a Special Committee of the Senate, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, be appointed to organize and hold a conference for the purpose of determining the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future, whose responsibility would be to help as many private and public organizations as possible to forecast and build their future not only in isolation but together."

This motion was designed to implement a recommendation contained in Volume 2 of the report of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy. Another proposal presented in that volume recommended:

"That the Economic Council should enlarge its activities and establish a special Committee on the Future with broad terms of reference but looking more specifically at the years 2000 and 1985 and attempting to project various possible environments that could emerge from the extrapolation of identifiable Canadian trends within the international context."

Thus, what the committee had in mind when it prepared its report was to attain two specific objectives: first, to launch systematic futures research in Canada; secondly, to gather and diffuse in usable form the best information available in the world on the future so as to improve Canadian decision-making in the private as well as in the public sectors. The purpose of holding a conference was to consult a representative group of Canadian decision makers on the feasibility of institutions designed to meet these two objectives.

In preparing the proposed conference, the committee had to start from scratch because very little had been done in Canada in the area of research and information on the future. We had to learn what was going on in the world in this field. As a result of this preliminary operation, the information accumulated by our staff on this topic is certainly the most complete and up to date that exists in Canada. This is a most valuable asset.

On the basis of that information, a series of preliminary working papers was prepared and compressed in a document entitled "Managing the Future: Conference on Anticipatory Institutions". The committee proposes to print that document together with the present report so that both will be available to the public for future reference.

That document was finalized in mid-January 1975 and distributed to a number of experts in Canada and abroad. The chairman also sent a copy to the Prime Minister because it was felt that the active participation of the government was necessary if futures research and information were to be improved in Canada.

The Prime Minister answered on February 21, 1975, partly as follows:

"Thank you for sending me your report regarding the proposed conference on futures studies in Canada. I have taken note of this document with the utmost interest and, as I have told you before, I, like you, desire to see an improvement of the conditions in which decisions are taken in the public sector—

It is with regret that I have accepted John Aird's resignation from The Senate. However, I know he will bring a valuable contribution to the Institute for Research on Public Policy. This organization has taken longer to start than I had hoped and I would be happy if you would discuss with Mr. Aird the role that the Institute should play in these studies. It would seem in effect that this organization should initially be given the responsibility of the important tasks which you have so well defined."

Thus, it became clear that the Prime Minister agreed with the committee's objectives and recognized the need for more and better futures research and information. This was the substance of the message contained in our document. He felt, however, that this need should be met by the Institute for Research on Public Policy rather than by new institutions to be designed by Canadian decision-makers during a special conference.

The different strategy proposed by the Prime Minister is understandable. As he says in his letter, the Institute established in 1972 has taken longer to start than he had hoped. With its very broad and rather vague terms of reference, the Institute found it difficult to define a concrete mission and to properly organize its activities. To function effectively, it probably needs a major and continuing program such as the one our committee put forward in its document.

On April 1, 1975, Mr. C. R. Nixon, then deputy secretary to the Cabinet, wrote as follows to Dr. A. W. R. Carrothers, president of the Institute:

"Dear Mr. Carrothers,

I should like to outline thoughts on some work which IRPP might wish to consider undertaking on a contract basis. The work is on a topic which I believe lies near the center of the concerns of your institute; namely, the preparation of a comprehensive appreciation of the present situation and trends that exist in Canadian society, and how these might interact to form possible futures for the country.

There appears to be a quite general feeling that all levels of Canadian life would benefit if the decisions taken at those various levels could be made against a perspective of possible and projected long-term trends in Canadian society. From the government's point of view, such a perspective would permit Cabinet to make choices against a longer time horizon and against a broader backdrop than is normally available; it would permit policy options to be developed within departments in the light of comprehensive portrayals of existing conditions, trends and possible futures; and it would allow departmental management to consider operational decisions in the light of longer term implications of these decisions. The appreciation should similarly be helpful to other levels of government, academia, and the private sector in their research, planning, and decision-making.

In our initial thoughts it seemed that there was merit in putting the main emphasis on the trends within the various sectors of society, working from the current situation as a point of reference, rather than trying to give a precise picture of life as it might be foreseen at any future point in time. Nevertheless, it would seem worthwhile, as well, to choose one or two points in time (e.g., 1985 and 2000), at which to consider how the balance and interaction between the evolving trends might stand. These focussed images of the evolving trends could serve to add coherence to foreseen or possible developments.

In all this, let me make the point that the reason for pursuing this project is the assumption that the future has not been determined but is, at least to some extent, a matter of choice; it is the set of possible futures and the required choices along with "surprise-free" projections, which are of interest.

Let me add the following specific thoughts on the characteristics of the project which we contemplate:

This would be a periodic document undertaken under a contract with the federal government which would be updated annually or biennially.

It would, of course, be a public document which would not only yield benefits to the government but would also serve to stimulate public discussion.

There would seem to be some virtue either within the report itself, or in a companion document, in providing a commentary on other appreciations of the future such as have been done by the Ontario Economic Council and the Hudson Institute.

As a point of reference, we had pictured the Fall of 1976 as being a target date for the initial report which could give results in reasonably broad outline and which could serve as the foundation for more precise portrayals subsequently as capabilities developed.

I appreciate that this project would be a major undertaking which you would not wish to enter into lightly. I would, however, be grateful for the opportunity, after you have had a chance to give it some thought, to discuss with you the substance and scope of such work. After such discussion I would anticipate receiving a proposal from your Institute which could be used as a basis for contract."

It is quite obvious that Mr. Nixon's letter merely spells out the committee's original recommendations. It even mentions the same target years of 1985 and 2000. Mr. John Aird, our former colleague who is now the Institute's chairman of the board, asked Dr. Carrothers to meet with our chairman to discuss the content of Mr. Nixon's proposal. This meeting was held on May 9. Dr. Carrothers then stated that he would submit this proposal to the Institute's executive committee on May 21. Our chairman invited Dr. Carrothers to meet our committee to report on the executive committee's reaction.

This meeting took place on May 27. Dr. Carrothers reported that the Institute's executive committee had decided to recommend that the board of directors approve a plan of action for considering Mr. Nixon's request which would include

"The retention of a consultant and the appointment of advisers to assist in preparing a submission to the Privy Council Office subject to review by the executive committee or the board with a view to undertaking macro studies along the lines described in the request and with a view to serving as a catalyst and clearing house for forecasting studies in Canada as may be determined by the Institute's perception of needs and its capacity to meet it."

Members of the committee noted the close similarity, even in the terms used, between the substance of this proposal and the basic aims expressed in the committee's working paper. They felt that what the committee and the Institute had in mind was not to initiate complementary operations but alternative strategies designed to meet the same needs. Since the executive committee's proposal would be submitted to the Institute's board of directors on June 11, it was decided to invite Dr. Carrothers to appear again before the committee on June 17.

At this second meeting, Dr. Carrothers reported that the Institute's board had agreed to commission a feasibility study to be made by a consultant supported by a committee of advisers. He indicated that the study would include the feasibility of both the futures research and the futures information functions which, according to the committee's plans, would otherwise have been considered at the proposed conference. He also mentioned that the board had retained the authority to make a final determination on Mr. Nixon's request at its next meeting in November when it would receive the results of the feasibility study.

Thus, it appeared even more clearly than during the first meeting that what the Institute was intending to do in response to Mr. Nixon's request was almost a mere duplication of the special Senate committee's mandate. Dr. Carrothers even mentioned that if the Institute decided, on the basis of the feasibility study, to respond positively to Mr. Nixon's request, he expected that a conference would be held before launching the new futures research and information operations.

Moreover, when Dr. Carrothers was asked by Senator Grosart if there was a need for the special Senate committee to go ahead with its mandate and for the Institute's new undertaking, he expressed his personal view that the two operations "would probably involve a degree of duplication which probably should be avoided and to that extent therefore it may be concluded that both would not at this time be in the public interest."

When the Special Committee on Science Policy first proposed that the Senate sponsor a conference to launch futures research and information in Canada, the Institute did not exist and the Canadian government had not yet expressed any real interest in this area. The Senate was seen then as the only appropriate body, with the required impartiality, motivation and expertise, through its special committee, to sponsor such an undertaking, although as it was pointed out at the time, this initiative would be an unprecedented activity for our chamber.

It has now become obvious that the Institute is prepared to assume this responsibility and that the Canadian government is willing to finance it. The committee is convinced that such a development is the direct result of its work and feels that the Senate should not attempt to duplicate it.

The committee therefore recommends that its present mandate to hold a conference for the purpose of determining the feasibility of establishing a Commission of the Future, be terminated.

The Institute has a sufficiently broad basis to successfully launch this new major operation. Indeed, the federal and provincial governments as well as various segments of the private sector of Canadian society are represented on its board of directors or its council of trustees. However, to establish its credibility in this important and complex area, it will have to give top priority to the new program and develop a high degree of expertise which it has not yet acquired.

In its new endeavour, the Institute will need all the assistance it can get. The committee feels that it can be of great help by making available all the information and documentation it has already accumulated. Dr. Carrothers has said that the Institute would be very pleased to have access to this material.

We believe, however, that our overall mission has not yet been completed. We feel that we should resume our watchdog role in three specific areas.

First, we should make a survey of futures research programs being carried out within government departments and agencies and see how the Institute will develop its new area of activities. We have succeeded in making futures research a Canadian Government priority. We are under the impression, however, that government departments and agencies are developing their research effort in isolation in this area as in so many others. This "policy by accident" is wasteful. Dr. Carrothers has told us that the Institute intends to become "a catalyst and clearing house for forecasting studies in Canada" but he emphasized the point that it had no authority over the activities of other research organizations. However, the committee has shown in its working paper the need for co-ordinated national networks of futures research and information and now feels that it has the obligation to monitor on-going activities in this area to make sure, in so far as it can, that this need will be effectively met.

Secondly, the committee should make a systematic review of the implementation of the recommendations contained in its report on science policy. In 1972 and 1973 we made about 73 formal recommendations and many more other suggestions. We know that many of these proposals have been accepted by the government but it is impossible to see how they have been implemented without meeting those who have that responsibility. For instance, the make-or-buy policy which we recommended to help industry carry out more research and development activities on a contractual basis has been accepted by the government but there is a general impression that departments and agencies should buy much more than they do and, in the process, further strengthen the innovative capacity of private industry. We believe that the zeal for desirable reforms created by our report two or three years ago has diminished and that the proposed review might prevent the return of the former status quo.

Thirdly, the committee should hold hearings on the Canadian science budget. In Volume 3 of our report, we recommended that the government present in an annual document its estimates of expenditures for scientific activities and that a committee of the Senate be authorized to make an overall review of those estimates. On February 28, 1974, the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, who was then Minister of State for Science and Technology, announced that her ministry "will be responsible for the development of a science policy framework against which individual policies can be viewed" and that a science budget display "will be used for the evaluation of departmental and agency budgetary proposals for scientific activity". The Minister added that "MOSST will evaluate these proposals prior to final consideration and approval by Treasury Board and publish annually a report analyzing federal expenditures on science and technology". The committee feels that it should scrutinize this report and consider how the new system of evaluation works.

It seems to us that these three specific areas deserve to be investigated.

The committee, therefore, recommends that it be authorized to consider and report on Canadian government and other expenditures on scientific activities and matters related thereto;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and clerical personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to sit during adjournments of the Senate and to report from time to time; and

That the committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

Respectfully submitted,

Maurice Lamontagne,
Chairman.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972.

He said: Honourable senators, the other day in this chamber I mentioned the anguish that I was experiencing in trying to adequately dissect this piece of legislation. I hope that by now all senators will have had the opportunity to experience somewhat the same sensation. It is a difficult piece of legislation but, in my opinion, a very significant one. It is particularly significant considering the state of our current federal-provincial relations, and it bears close examination by this body.

Honourable senators, as you realize, this bill is an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972. Basically, there are two completely distinct categories involved in this amendment, although both categories are to a great extent interrelated. First, the bill deals with equalization payments to be made by Canada to the provinces. Secondly, it deals with the revenue guarantee program. Those two aspects are really quite distinct for purposes of our discussion this evening.

The necessity to amend the equalization payments provisions arises entirely because of the onslaught of the now all too familiar energy crisis. The amendments to the revenue guarantee program arise out of the—and I could say the all too familiar—1971 Income Tax Act, or the tax reform measures of that year, as they have been described, which took effect in 1972.

First, I would like to deal with the amendments to Part I of the act, which are the amendments affecting equalization payments. Equalization, as a concept in our history, is not new. Honourable senators will realize that we have had certain forms of equalization ever since the days of Confederation. However, a radical revision of our equalization procedures, practices and policies came about in 1957 when the last federal-provincial tax rental agreement came up for renewal. During the period since 1957 there have been many and varied modifications to that act.

I do not propose to deal with those specific modifications this evening. Basically they were designed to meet the exigencies of the economic conditions in Canada as they arose, and as they varied from province to province.

Finally, in 1967, the present system was introduced, and set forth in the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of that year. In 1972 further amendments were necessitated by disparities arising through the application of the formulae, and not hitherto contemplated.

The present act was brought into force to cover the five-year period until 1977.

Honourable senators will realize that at this point in time we are approximately half way through the five-year period, at the end of which the basic concepts underlying the act will be re-examined in depth by federal and provincial officials for the purpose of revision and embodiment in a new piece of legislation.

As I have mentioned, the necessity to amend the equalization formulae arose because of the complete distortion created by the large windfall revenues to the oil and gas producing provinces. This windfall, of course, was a result of the actions of the oil cartel countries, the OPEC countries, and the effect of those actions on world oil prices.

If world oil prices, as are now in effect, were fully taken into the formula under the present fiscal arrangements, a tax burden would be imposed on the people of Canada completely beyond their ability to finance. The present formula, for instance, if carried forward, would jump the 1974-75 estimates of the total cost of the program, which is now $1.7 billion, to approximately $4 billion, and I would ask honourable senators to bear in mind that the cost of the program has already doubled from $1 billion to $2 billion during the last three years.

In addition, the effect of the complete recognition of world prices under the present formula would affect the provinces of Saskatchewan and Ontario noticeably by putting Ontario, theoretically, in the position of a have-not province, and raising the entitlement under this formula for Ontario to approximately $814 million annually. Such inclusion would also wipe out Saskatchewan's entitlement completely.

Accordingly, the Minister of Finance recognized early the impossibility of the present situation, and these amendments are the product of an attempt to remedy the deficiencies and create a fair and equitable alternative.

Honourable senators might ask: How, in fact, does this bill deal with the problem? If this bill is passed, the federal cost of the equalization of oil and gas revenues would be limited to an increase from $257 million to $380 million for the fiscal period 1974-75, and from $380 to $415 million in 1975-76. This, indeed, is no mean increase in payments attributable to the inclusion of oil in the revenue formula, but it is an increase that is deemed manageable at the present time.

This limitation is accomplished in the following manner: first, provincial oil and gas revenues that are not attributable to world cartel prices—in other words, oil and gas prices as they were before the impact of the actions of the OPEC countries—are designated now as "basic revenues." Those basic revenues are included to the full extent for the equalization program. Revenues from oil and gas over and above basic revenues are referred to and designated as "additional revenues." In other words, they are the revenues realized from oil and gas by the provinces over and above the basic revenues of the fiscal year 1973-74.

Secondly, there is in this bill a reclassification of oil and gas revenues from four classes to six classes. This tends to group these revenues into more homogeneous categories, and it recognizes the provincial taxes now imposed for the first time by the provinces on a new source, namely, freehold oil and gas revenues.

Heretofore, there were four categories of such revenues, namely, crown oil revenues, crown gas revenues, sale of crown leases and reservations on oil and gas lands, and, finally, other miscellaneous oil and gas revenues, generally of a minor nature, such as from permits, licence fees, and so forth. The result of this reclassification is interesting. It will in fact increase the equalization costs by about $3 million, but it will prevent Saskatchewan from becoming overnight a have province, and thereby disentitled to equalization payments.

It is interesting to note, and I think important for the Senate to consider, the fact that the government has deemed it advisable to include in the formula one-third of the additional revenues to which I have referred. The criticisms that were expressed in the other place, and which I have read, are based on the fact that this is an arbitrary amount to include, and that it has no objective reality. What I suggest it does represent, honourable senators, is an honest attempt by the government to bridge the distortions that are coming into play by virtue of the energy crisis. Further than that, it is not entirely an arbitrary figure, because it was suggested by the oil-producing provinces, not jointly but separately, that it would be their intention to segregate two-thirds of those additional funds and place them in a capital account to be used for the exploration and development of oil and gas. So it does fit the expressed intentions of the oil and gas producing provinces, by including the other one-third only. That equalization formula produces a result which is manageable in tax terms in the country today.

I turn now to the second part of these amendments, which are to Part IV of the act, and will deal with the income tax revenue guarantee sections. Honourable senators will recall the widespread concern that attended the passage of the 1971 Income Tax Act. This concern was shared by everyone who was at all knowledgeable about the effects of that measure, and arose out of the fact that the changes were so fundamental in principle and so massive in scope that the nature, effect and weight of the tax could really only be guessed at, even by those in the department charged with the drafting of the provisions.

Naturally, the concern as to the impact of this tax was felt very keenly by the provincial governments which were in receipt of payments under the equalization formula. This was so because that tax impacted on their revenues, either adversely or beneficially, so their entitlements under the equalization payments could vary considerably, up or down.

Accordingly, in 1972, under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of that year, the government guaranteed to the provinces that, no matter what the actual effect of the tax reform measure was, their combined personal and corporation taxes, and their equalization payments, if any, would not fall below what those sources of revenue earned for the provinces prior to the introduction of the tax reform act.

There were conditions attached to that guarantee: first, that the provinces harmonize their tax legislation with the federal tax system; and secondly, that they do not jig up their personal tax rates under such circumstances that the increases might be interpreted by the public as attributable to the introduction of the new federal legislation.

Senator Flynn: Oh?

Senator Langlois: Fair enough.

Senator Lang: These conditions have worked beneficially in terms of harmonizing the tax structure during the unsettled years after the new act was introduced. However, the legislation can be open to the interpretation that this guarantee applies no matter what the federal government, in its wisdom, decides to do with the rates or structures under the Income Tax Act between 1972 and 1977. It was indeed anticipated, at the time of the tax reform bill, that it would be very unlikely that significant changes would be made to federal tax legislation until 1977.

Senator Flynn: Seriously?

Senator Lang: Yes, that is my information. However, history has proved otherwise and there were significant changes during the years 1972, 1973 and 1974.

Senator Flynn: Unbelievable.

Senator Lang: These changes included such items as accelerated depreciation on capital equipment in the corporate field, right down to the elimination of the first $1,000 of investment income from personal tax calculations. These reductions have had the effect of reducing the provincial tax revenues, as their acts were in lock step, by and large, with the federal Income Tax Act.

Early on, recognizing the effect of these tax changes upon the fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces, the Minister of Finance gave a commitment to the provinces that they would be compensated for reduced provincial revenues caused by the federal changes, and that this compensation would accrue to them through amendments to the formula under the equalization payments scheme. At the moment, the payments to the provinces across Canada under the guarantee scheme amount to $300 million annually, and those payments include all the provinces. The payments are made to all the provinces under the guarantee scheme, of course, because it is directly tied to the effects of federal tax legislation on provincial revenues.

As an exception to this commitment made, and now carried out, by the Minister of Finance, he did in 1973 state to his provincial counterparts that the then new indexing of personal income taxes—which was introduced to take into account the effects then being felt of inflation in our tax system—that any consequent loss of additional revenues to the provinces occasioned by that indexing would not be compensated for in the revenue guarantees. I think honourable senators would agree that that is fair, equitable and just, inasmuch as it precludes the provincial governments' financing expenditures out of inflation-generated tax dollars. It will be beneficial to every taxpayer in Canada. Bill C-57 now formally excludes from this federal guarantee any lower than anticipated revenues that the province might have received occasioned by the removal of the effects of inflation, and the indexing of personal rates and the personal tax brackets.

● (2030)

There are three other aspects to the guaranteed program which are dealt with by the amendments contained in this bill. Last December the Minister of Finance announced that it was the government's intention to allow greater flexibility to the provinces in connection with the provisions of their individual personal and corporation tax rates, and that this would be permitted without forcing the provinces to forego the benefits of the federal collection of provincial taxes on their behalf. Accordingly, it can readily be anticipated that in the future there will be greater variations than there are now between the federal and provincial tax acts.

This would create a serious anomaly in the administration of the formula. Therefore, under the present bill, a model is used to compute theoretical comparative provincial revenues, which is not only based on the federal corporate tax provisions but, for the first time, is now based on the federal personal tax provisions as the model on which the calculations are formulated.

This amendment will, in addition, preclude any province from lowering its tax rates thereby unilaterally qualifying itself for higher payments under the guarantee; or, conversely, from increasing its tax rates and having its guarantee correspondingly diminished. In other words, on the one hand, it precludes the provinces from taking unfair advantage of the formula, while, on the other hand, it protects a province which has the political courage to increase its tax levies by negating penalties that might otherwise occur under the guaranteeing provisions.

Honourable senators, the third amendment arises out of the recent practice of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia of rebating oil and gas revenue taxes produced by the federal disallowance of provincial tax levies in the computation of income. You will see that the federal government, in disallowing these deductions, thereby increased the taxable income of those companies so disallowed, and that increase of taxable income partly accrued to the benefit of the provinces in which it arose. The three oil and gas producing provinces promptly rebated to the individual taxpayers the benefits that accrued to them as a result of the federal disallowance. This, of course, created a further anomaly in the formula. The bill before us tonight excludes these rebates in computing the revenue guarantee, and this is done by a redefinition of the "actual yield of the corporation income tax", which is a technical phrase under the basic act.

● (2040)

That should cause some very happy faces in the governments of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and, indeed, it is a basic rapprochement by the federal government. It is an exhibit in proof of the federal government's flexibility in trying to react in a fair and equitable manner under the severe dislocations produced by the present economic scene.

Finally, honourable senators, this bill deals with another anomaly in the guarantee program. Under the program as it is now administered, if a province reduces its tax to conform to a federal change, it is compensated under the guarantee program. However, even if that province does not follow the federal tax reduction, but keeps its rate constant at the higher level, it will still be compensated under the general definitions for revenue guarantees. This is obviously inequitable, and in Bill C-57 an amendment provides that such tax differential would not be recognized in the computations under the formula. In other words, a province cannot have its cake and eat it too, via the guarantee program.

Honourable senators, I do not intend this evening to try to dissect for you the specific clauses of this bill, nor to explain how the principles and policies I have referred to are carried out by specific amendments to sections of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. You will undoubtedly have many questions to ask in committee, and I would certainly prefer that those questions be directed to the departmental officials who drafted this complicated piece of legislation.

I would like, in conclusion, to say a few words of general import. The concept of the equalization program, and indeed of the revenue guarantee program, is really so right, and so completely justified, in Canada that no fair minded person anywhere in this country would question its validity in principle; but how difficult, complicated and, indeed, exasperating, the application of those principles becomes in practice. This bill has given me, and I hope honourable senators also, some slight insight into the complexities involved in carrying out this program. It is no wonder that federal and provincial officials are constantly engaged in studies and consultations under this act. Notwithstanding, it is fairly easy to understand why those difficulties arise. It is not easy—and this is really self-evident—to devise formulae that have eternal validity under all circumstances, that are fair, and that hopefully can be applied with objectivity. If you impose upon that the rapidly changing economic conditions we have experienced in the past few years, the variety of ways in which these problems have been impinging on Canadians, depending entirely on where they live within the country, becomes obvious. I think recognition of those factors will inevitably lead to the conclusion that this program must be adaptable, must be flexible, and it must, to a certain extent, involve arbitrary judgments of the federal government. Those arbitrary judgments, however, be they more or less so, are in fact indicative of the initiative that the government has been discharging in this very difficult area.

Honourable senators will recall that Ontario since 1957, and Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta since 1965, have been the contributors to the rest of the provinces in Canada under this equalization scheme. I am certain that no person in those three provinces would question the worth or validity of the equalization scheme. The rest of the provinces—that is, those which benefit under the scheme financially—would consider this program as the basic cement of Confederation, and that, honourable senators, I submit, is what it is.

Today we are living in a world that is everywhere subjected to the energy crisis, is everywhere subjected to the evils of high inflation, and is practically everywhere subject to a concomitant economic recession of probably as serious proportions as we have experienced since the thirties. These events are of necessity going to strain the fabric of Confederation, because under these conditions the paramountcy of provincial concerns will be looming large in the minds of the provinces themselves, and they will take a different form, depending upon where they are viewed from, whether in Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland or Saskatchewan.

In this bill the federal government has taken a definite and significant lead in meeting the challenge, and I might add, by way of parenthesis, that I think that over the past few years the Minister of Finance is to be commended for the open, candid and really forthright manner in which he has dealt with these problems and with his provincial counterparts and their officials. This attitude of the Minister of Finance cannot but commend itself to all Canadians today, particularly when many of us here would readily recognize that less desirable characteristics in this difficult area could, and probably would, help him to avoid many of the political slings and arrows which he, by his candid posture, has invited. Frankly, I commend Mr. Turner for this, and for the political courage he has shown.

I also commend, honourable senators, this bill to your favourable consideration, and I hope that the Senate, and thereafter the provinces, will endorse its provisions wholeheartedly, particularly bearing in mind that the very reason for these amendments is a continued concern for the preservation and strengthening of the fabric of Confederation.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

PETRO-CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-8, to establish a national petroleum company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill was fully debated on the floor of the other place, and at the meetings of the Commons Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. However, as the Honourable the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said:

The bill is neither lengthy nor complex, and detailed discussion of its provisions should be held for the committee stage.

In the hope that this course will commend itself to honourable senators, I will deal only with the purpose of the bill and give a general outline of the corporation which will be created if the bill becomes law.

The purpose of the bill is to establish a national petroleum company as a crown corporation and to provide for its purposes, objects and powers. Perhaps this may be best explained by my reading clause 3 of the bill:

[Senator Lang.]

Purpose of Act

3. The purpose of this Act is to establish within the energy industries in Canada a Crown owned company with authority to explore for hydrocarbon deposits, to negotiate for and acquire petroleum products from abroad to assure a continuity of supply for the needs of Canada, to develop and exploit deposits of hydrocarbons within and without Canada in the interests of Canada, to carry out research and development projects in relation to hydrocarbons and other fuels, and to engage in exploration for, and the production, distribution, refining and marketing of, fuels.

The corporation to be created will be known in both French and English as "Petro-Canada." Clause 5 specifies that the authorized capital is to be $500 million, and that the amount subscribed from time to time shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. In addition to the $500 million of paid-up capital the government is authorized by clauses 21, 22 and 23 to provide by means of loans, guarantees and otherwise, a further $1 billion of loan capital.

Clause 6 and clause 7(1) set out in detail all the necessary objects, powers and duties necessary for the corporation to carry out the purposes of the bill.

Subclauses (2), (3), (4) and (5) of clause 7 should be drawn to your attention. Subclause (2) provides that the corporation shall comply with any directions given by the government with respect to the exercise of its powers, and subclauses (3), (4) and (5) provide that three months before the commencement of each financial year the corporation shall submit to the minister its capital budget for approval.

The balance of the bill deals with the following headings: Board of Directors; Chairman of the Board; President of the Corporation; Head Office; Administration of Corporation; Borrowing Powers; Status of Corporation; Staff, Financial; Dividends; Government Assistance; and Audit. These are all important matters but they do not affect the principle of the bill and can therefore be better discussed and passed or amended in committee.

Clause 25, however, requires special attention. The federal government holds a 45 per cent interest in Panarctic Oils Limited. Clause 25 authorizes the sale of the federal government's 45 per cent share of Panarctic Oils to the corporation at such fair and reasonable price as may be agreed upon by the Governor in Council and the corporation.

Honourable senators, I have attempted to explain the bill and perhaps I should now follow a good rule and quit when ahead. On the other hand, I think I should explain briefly why such a bill comes before us. It seems to me that the minister gave a very interesting outline of the government policy on which this bill is based. The policy behind the bill is to ensure for Canadians adequate and reliable supplies of energy at reasonable prices, as well as a direct share in the wealth which the development of our resources generates.

It is, of course, debatable whether or not a significant degree of federal public enterprise in the oil and natural gas area is good policy or bad policy. Canada already has federal efforts in the uranium and nuclear sectors, and, of course, there are provincial activities in electric power. In this day and age there seems to be no sound reason against some public ownership and investment in oil and natural gas.

The government does not consider that Canada has not been well served by private enterprise in the petroleum industry. However, the bill is concerned with the future and not with the past. In view of the enormous amounts of capital which will be required to secure the energy needed for Canada's development in future years, it seems wise that public sources should be called upon to enlarge the work of the private sector. It should be clearly understood that Petro-Canada will not replace private industry. Canada will still look to the private sector to continue to find, develop, transport and deliver the bulk of our five energy needs. Petro-Canada is intended to supplement and stimulate the efforts of the private sector.

● (2100)

Finally, a national petroleum company may in the future play a very important role in enlarging the percentage of domestic ownership of our energy resources. The existing situation is that in excess of 90 per cent of our petroleum is in foreign ownership or control. A nationally owned company could bring together smaller Canadian companies into a larger, more competitive entity through joint ventures and the forming of various consortia. The development of the North will require capital of a magnitude not normally available to most Canadian-owned companies. The national corporation can play a decisive role in the formation of joint ventures in an attempt to alleviate this problem. Such partnerships may offer viable alternatives to the small Canadian operators who, in the past, have had to sell out to the internationals when they ran short of risk capital.

A few days ago I heard a radio commentator say that there is a new bumper sticker out West which reads, "If you like our Post Office you will love our National Oil Company." This may prove to be the case; only the future can tell. It will probably take 10 years or more before any judgment can be made. As the minister pointed out during the debate in the other place, the government has no illusion that the establishment of a national petroleum company is likely to lead to early and spectacular results in terms of massive energy development or financial success.

It is, of course, perfectly true that Petro-Canada is joining a pretty tough league. The present members of the league are all private enterprise companies and they seem to be most competent; at any rate they tell us often enough that they are.

We must have faith that Petro-Canada will perform well and justify its creation. Surely we have sufficient examples of well-run national concerns to give us good reason to believe that Petro-Canada will attract good sound administrators, engineers, geologists, and all others necessary to make an excellent oil team which will operate a company which will compare favourably in every way with companies in the private sector. If this indeed proves to be the case, the creation of a national oil company will result in very many benefits, both direct and indirect, to all Canadians.

I commend the bill to honourable senators, and if it should receive second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Lang for second reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, we had an unusually excellent explanation of this somewhat complex bill from Senator Lang, the sponsor, yesterday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1410)

Senator Grosart: If I remember, I will take the opportunity later to make that compliment more specific. In the meantime, however, I must say I am less enthusiastic than he was about the merits of this particular bill—

Senator Perrault: Oh!

Senator Grosart: —and actually find myself almost in an opposite position to the very high praise that he gave to the federal government in the matter of federal-provincial relations. I will expand on that in a moment.

I agree with him, of course, that these large federal payments to the provinces, in whatever category they may come, are in many ways—to use his phrase—the cement of Confederation. However, it will be my duty to point out that as a result of federal government action at the time this bill was in passage through the other place, some very alarming cracks were observed in that Confederation in this respect.

Perhaps the best that can be said about the bill is that it was a necessary ad hoc response to an emergency situation which arose as a result of the fantastic increase in the oil prices brought about by the OPEC countries, and the very great increase in what have been called “windfall” revenues to certain provinces. We have been told by the government that those would have entailed an additional $2 billion—Senator Lang explained this yesterday—in federal government expenditures in this particular area of payment to the provinces, and that obviously that amount would have had to be raised by additional taxation.

I say that it was a necessary ad hoc response. It can also be said that at the time the bill was introduced there appeared to be fairly general acceptance of the provisions of the bill by the provinces—acceptance, but not necessarily approval. There are perhaps two major exceptions—one at either extreme of opinion on the necessity for the provisions of this bill. At one end there was the problem of Nova Scotia, which made the case that all additional revenues accruing from oil and gas revenues should be included in the calculations for equalization payments to the provinces. At the other end there was the position taken by Saskatchewan that this bill is, in effect, a refusal by the federal government to carry out a specific commitment made a few months before the bill was introduced. It can also be said for the bill, mercifully, that it is of temporary duration—temporary to the extent, of course, that it will cover only the remaining period of the arrangement made under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1972, which will run to the end of the 1976-77 fiscal year.

We also have the assurance of the Minister of Finance that steps have already been taken to begin discussions with the provinces on a much more permanent and better conceptual approach to this problem than that indicated by the bill.

Senator Lang used the word “conceptual” several times in his speech, and we all understand what he meant. He was saying, in effect, that it is important that there be a clear and permanent concept of the basis of payments to the provinces, particularly equalization payments. It has to be said that this is not a conceptual approach. It is an ad hoc approach, and understandably so under the circumstances, but it should not, in my view, be regarded in any way as adding anything to the basic concept of federal-provincial relations in this field. The worst that can be said is that there is a package of objections to the bill. In the first place, of course, it has been said—it is not necessarily a long-term criticism but it is worth emphasizing—that the bill introduces a completely new concept into the traditional concepts of payments to the provinces in this particular area of resources.

Up to the present time the concept has always been that all provincial resources which form the tax bases on which the equalization payments are based should be included. In some measure this bill excludes some, and in that sense it is a major departure from the conceptual platform on which this very important federal-provincial program has always been based since its inception.

I might say that in some respects it goes back even beyond the excellent history which Senator Lang gave us. We are all aware that it goes back to the very beginning of Confederation when there were statutory equalization payments agreed upon. These, of course, are still in effect and amount to some $30 million of expenditures under the unconditional payments to the provinces.

It can also be said, as I indicated, that there is a clear suggestion of the federal government's going back unilaterally on a commitment it made, that in the case of oil and gas revenues which were put into a capital fund, or sequestered, as the phrase is, for development and exploitation purposes, such revenues would be exempt from the calculation of the base for equalization payments. That was a clear commitment. I do not think there is any doubt about that. It was a commitment made by both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance explained why he felt it was necessary for him to change his mind, but it is not an entirely convincing explanation. He said at the time that Saskatchewan had indicated it would sequester some 65 per cent of these additional revenues, and that there was a suggestion Alberta might sequester 100 per cent, and, because there would be some uncertainty for the time being, the Minister of Finance decided that two-thirds of the additional revenues would be sequestered. It was definitely a reversal of a clear commitment—not a commitment made before the OPEC crisis but very shortly before the introduction of the bill.

It can be said, in criticism if not in objection to the bill, that one would be surprised at the rather gratuitous comment that the provinces should not be allowed in this particular field, and presumably in any other field, to benefit from the additional taxes that might come about due to inflation. I say it is gratuitous and surprising because if any entity in Canada has benefited from additional revenues created by inflation it is the federal government. However, that same government does not feel that the principle of benefit should be extended to the provinces. This is the same government, of course, that resisted the principle of indexing, which was proposed by the Conservative Party. To its credit the government acceded in due course. It seems to me highly gratuitous now to suggest that any benefits from inflation should not reflect in the revenues to the provinces.

Again, there is provision in the act for the sequestering, as I have indicated, of two-thirds of certain parts of the additional revenues, the windfall revenues. Yet, strangely enough, the federal government itself, in the various interventions it has made in this field, has not legislated to put aside a single dollar for the development of our oil and gas resources. This applies to the additional tax on gas to this bill, and it applies, as far as I can see, to the full government policy at the moment. The federal government has been concerned only with its own loss of revenues, and in no way with the major problem at a time when our resources are depletable and may be depleting fairly quickly. The government, in its own program, has not arranged through legislation to put aside a single dollar for this very important aspect of the problem.

It is important, I think, to put this bill in the whole context of federal-provincial payments. Honourable senators will, I hope, excuse me if I take a minute to attempt to do so. I am sure the Leader of the Government will, because on another occasion he showed that he himself, in spite of his vast information on many other things, had some lack of understanding of the methodology of federal payments to the provinces.

● (1420)

I remember that on one occasion I referred to the fiscal transfer payments as amounting in the present budget to $2.4 billion. The Leader of the Government was at some pains to correct me and say that the correct figure was $7.7

billion. He was partly right; yet I suggest he was wrong in fact, because I particularly used the phrase "federal fiscal transfer payments," which are classified officially as something within the whole spectrum of federal-provincial payments.

Of course, we are all aware that the purpose of all these payments is to support the provincial levels of services, whether they be conditional or unconditional payments, and through the provinces to the municipalities. The general context is this. The federal government, in the present budget, has estimated that it will pay to the provinces some $7.7 billion this year. This will, of course, be increased by the present bill.

It is perhaps important to make it clear that this is an appropriation bill. It appropriates very large sums retroactively. I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition will, whether he speaks on the bill or not, have some reservations about the fact that it purports to commit federal spending into the very indefinite future, because the bill does purport to obtain from Parliament at this time a mandate to spend money next year and the year after. The bill is also retroactive. This is another feature some of us object to from time to time in bills. It is retroactive to April 1, 1974.

In this large area of the $7.7 billion of payments to the provinces there are what are called conditional payments and unconditional payments. The unconditional payments amount to the $2.4 billion figure, and the two major items in this bill, the two items that have been described by the government as two of the main pillars of federal support for the provinces, come within the category of the unconditional grants, amounting to about $2 billion in the equalization payments and some $340 million in the revenue guaranteed payments, those being two major areas dealt with in the bill. In the other area, that of the conditional grants, we have naturally very major items making up the remaining $5 billion or more: hospital insurance, $2.1 billion; Medicare, $800 million; the Canada Assistance Plan, $1.1 billion; post-secondary education, $1.3 billion. I mention these figures because they are so closely related to the whole purport of this bill.

It may interest senators to have just a rough idea of the effect at the moment of these equalization payments. The purpose of the equalization payments is, of course, to assess the revenue potential of some 20 tax bases of the provinces, and from that to calculate equalization payments, which will have the effect of raising all provincial services in all provinces to approximately the same level. This has been achieved. The total per capita payments now have increased, as the Minister of Finance told us, from $1 billion about three years ago to $2 billion, for good and explainable reasons.

The per capita equalization payments in total now have risen from $106 per person to $197. In Newfoundland the figures have risen from $215 million to $371 million; in Prince Edward Island from $224 million to $410 million; in Nova Scotia from $155 million to $296 million; in New Brunswick from $162 million to $322 million; in Quebec from $88 million to $167 million; in Manitoba from $68 million to $122 million; and in Saskatchewan from $112 million to $127 million. In some cases this accounts for a considerable portion of the total provincial revenue. In the case of Newfoundland, for example, this amounts to 58 per cent of all revenue raised provincially in that province. I make that clear, that I am not saying this is 58 per cent of the total revenue but 58 per cent of the revenue already raised by Newfoundland from provincial taxation. It was 57 per cent in Prince Edward Island; 46 per cent in Nova Scotia; 47 per cent in New Brunswick; and from 17 to 18 per cent for Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. That makes seven provinces. Of course, we are all aware that equalization payments are paid only to those seven provinces.

Senator Lang gave us a paean of praise of the federal government's generosity in this field. It almost indicates to me a degree of paternalism for which the recipient provinces should be eternally grateful to the federal government. The fact of the matter, of course, is that in effect these are transfers from three provinces to the other seven. The taxes are collected by the federal government, but I think Senator Lang may have had his tongue in cheek when he praised the federal government for this fantastic generosity in transferring some of the resources of three provinces. There is no question that those provinces do not object in principle, but perhaps he went a little far in his enthusiasm for his party at that particular time. And I make no comment on my qualification "at that particular time."

Honourable senators, what surprised me, when the bill went through the other place, was that it went through so quickly. There were two short debates—it was referred to committee in between, but I do not think the committee spent more than an hour on the bill—and it was passed.

I think the dates are important. The bill was introduced on first reading on March 21 and had second reading on June 2. It had third reading and passed on July 8. One would ask why there was not more discussion on the bill if it has some of the disadvantages that I am suggesting. The reason, I think, was obvious—because there intervened the mini-budget of July 23.

An Hon. Senator: June 23.

Senator Grosart: Yes, June 23.

Senator Flynn: It is not as late as you think.

Senator Grosart: Sometimes I wonder if it is not earlier than I think.

This upset the whole applecart, because there was fairly general agreement that, in the particular area of these unconditional payments, this was for the time being a reasonable ad hoc solution. But the mini-budget introduced a completely new concept, new conceptual values, into this whole area of federal-provincial payments. It is for that reason I suggested it was worthwhile looking at the whole context—because these dealt with two important matters, medicare and hospitalization, that is to say, the 50 per cent open-end grants to the provinces under these two particular categories of conditional grants. And quite rightly there was a response from the provinces which raised again the wonder of some of us that the present government ever dared to use the phrase "cooperative federalism."

● (1430)

I say that a decision of the government to announce the phasing-out of its position, the phasing-out or limitation of its grants in hospitalization and medicare, was an almost fantastic piece of effrontery. Here, while this whole subject was being discussed, while the bill had reasonably easy passage, the government came along and said, "We are changing the whole concept. We don't care what commitments we have made in the past. We are not concerned;"—and it was the federal government which forced the provinces into the universality of these particular programs—"we have decided unilaterally, without consulting the provinces, to terminate and limit." And so the fat was in the fire.

It is clear from the evidence before us so far that the Minister of Finance did not consult the provinces before making these announcements. If he has consulted them, he has not said so, and, if I am wrong, I will be delighted to be corrected. On that point the Leader of the Opposition in the other place made the following statement:

I do not know how a Minister of Finance of Canada can expect a provincial treasurer to have anything but skepticism at best, and cynicism at worst, about any conceptual argument put forward on behalf of the Government of Canada, because there are instances... where the federal government has reversed itself and completely changed its position when it has become convenient and profitable to do so.

The point is that the federal government itself raised the whole question of its credibility in this field. The Leader of the Opposition in the other house was not the only one to express a view on this subject. The Quebec Minister for Social Affairs, who is responsible for health services, sent the following telegram to the minister:

I deplore the unilateral setting of a ceiling without notice of federal participation in medical insurance—the evolution of medical care cannot be carried out in such a short time-span and this federal decision causes major uncertainties in its administration by the provinces.

The Premier of Ontario stated:

Federalism, in its present practice, has become a one-way street. The Government of Ontario cannot stand idly by while the Government of Canada plucks the Ontario taxpayers and consumers in order to feather its own nest.

The following is an official statement of one of the opposition parties in the other place—it is a socialist party statement:

We are not prepared to see the gains won in the hospital and medical care field torpedoed by a government which wants to solve its immediate financial problems by taking this regressive step. Therefore, we think this bill should not be passed at this time.

And by "this bill" the reference is to Bill C-57. And they proposed a six-months' hoist, which, of course, was not accepted by the government in the other place.

According to the information I have, the present situation is that every single province in Canada has protested this amazing unilateral act. If we are talking of conceptual values, then we must weigh the fact that this particular action took place after the bill had had second reading in the House of Commons. We must balance that against any praise there might be—and there is some praise—for the general overall results which it is hoped will accrue from this bill.

Senator Lang gave us an exhaustive explanation. I said I would compliment him specifically on this. My compliment is that the information he gave this chamber yesterday was far more comprehensive, far more useful and far more thorough-going than any information put forward by the government to date. Much of the information he gave us was not before the House of Commons, nor was it before their committee. I am not going to say that I wish Senator Lang was in the House of Commons—

Senator Flynn: Now, now. He is your friend, you know.

Senator Grosart: I was about to say that I do not know that he would not be in a better place if he were in the House of Commons, but I will hold that comment for the debate on the reform of the Senate. However, had he been there, I am sure this bill would have had much more thorough discussion than was the case, because he put actual figures of the effect of this bill before us that have not been put forward by the government previously.

He did tell us, when the order for second reading was called last Thursday, that he could not proceed until he had discussed the bill thoroughly with the officials of the Department of Finance. I am glad that he did, because the information is now on the record and will be useful in the assessment of this bill in the future. I am not saying that in a derogatory way; I am not saying that that information will in any way throw any further cloud over the government's credibility; on the contrary, I think the information that Senator Lang gave us will have the opposite effect.

He told us that the bill deals with two major aspects of federal-provincial payments; namely, the equalization grants and the revenue guarantee program. It is perhaps not necessary for me to go over the ground he covered so well, except to say that there is a distinction in the equalization payments between what are known as the "basic" and the "additional" revenues. The basic revenues are those that would accrue to the producing provinces before the OPEC situation developed, and the additional revenues are those which will accrue from now on. It is argued by the government, and I think with a good deal of validity, that these are revenues which would not normally have accrued to the provinces and which, certainly, do not reflect additional need in those provinces which are the recipients of equalization payments; but it is in this area, of course, that the government has made this major decision. Some have called it an arbitrary decision, but I am not myself convinced that that necessarily condemns it, since perhaps an arbitrary decision was necessary in this situation. The arbitrary decision was to say that some part of these revenues would be calculated in the equalization payments and that other parts would not.

It is interesting to see that Senator Manning is here. I would imagine that he will have some comment on this bill, because it is in this area that Senator Manning, in the years when he was Premier of Alberta, was perhaps the outstanding proponent of the concept that all provincial resource revenues from the oil and gas fields should be exempt from the equalization formula, which was rejected over and over again by the federal government. I do not want to anticipate any argument that Senator Manning might make, but he did, as I read the record, make a very impressive argument that special consideration should be given to these revenues because they are of a wasting or depleting nature. It seems to me that the government has to some extent reversed itself on the hard position it has taken over the years.

In conclusion, may I say again that Bill C-57, is ad hoc and temporary, and I trust that it will achieve its objectives. It has been said that equalization payments were never intended to cover windfalls, but this again raises a very important conceptual problem about future decisions regarding resource windfalls, if that is what they are. Let us take Nova Scotia, for example. If there is a major oil discovery off the eastern coast of that province, are the revenues from that oil to be based on the "old" rates that existed prior to OPEC, or on a new "old" rate; that is, the going price of oil and gas?

The same might be said of other resources: hydro-electric power, which is to some extent itself wasting and depleting, or iron ore in other provinces. On a conceptual basis are we to look forward to the uncertainty of the equalization status of any provincial resource which happens suddenly to increase its value or price on the world market, and be subject again to federal intervention of this kind? To prevent that, I am sure we all hope that the Minister of Finance will push on with his discussions with the provinces so that we will have in the future a national energy policy, which we do not have now, and that we will have at least a broad permanent conceptual basis in this very important area of federal-provincial relations.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I must admit that I had some difficulty in understanding the full implications of Bill C-57, which we are discussing at the present time. I read the debate in the other place which gave me a somewhat better appreciation, but that was before I had the opportunity to hear Senator Lang last night who gave us a very clear exposition of the bill. Then I went back and I did something I very seldom do—I read his speech and it sounded even better on reading it.

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by that?

Senator Croll: Now that I understand the bill I am really troubled, as indeed we should all be, because to those of us who are concerned with this matter what Senator Grosart said is of considerable importance.

This bill, which passed second reading in the House of Commons back in March, with very little attention paid to it, took on a completely new light after the mini-budget of June 23, and the new "conceptual values" were available under any aspect you might care to look at. It affected the provinces in so many ways that on July 8 last the debate in the House of Commons concerned medicare, hospitalization and relations with the provinces. That is the aspect I am going to deal with today.

I shall leave the figures to the people with sharp pencils who understand equalization, and who know how to collect the money; I shall simply try to tell them how to best spend it. Let me just say at the outset that in the field of social welfare, and more particularly where medicare, hospitalization and health grants are concerned, what we are doing today in the light of the mini-budget is turning back the clock.

Senator Flynn: Mini? Did you say mini?

Senator Croll: Well, perhaps not mini; just new.

Senator Grosart: It is a mean budget.

Senator Croll: I did not say that, but I do say that by implication it will affect practically all the relationships we have with the provinces.

My purpose today is really rather indirect, because there is another bill to be presented in the fall which will deal with medicare, hospitalization and various other aspects of social welfare. So today my purpose is to be what I would call a parliamentary picket, to let the people know, to warn them, to give notice and alert them, and to enter a caveat that I disagree with the purpose of the mini-budget and the effect it will have upon relationships with the provinces, particularly insofar as they concern the social welfare programs in this country. I am, of course, hoping that there will be other parliamentary pickets, and still others outside of Parliament, who will join in a peaceful but very purposeful attempt to indicate to the government that they are going off course.

As Senator Lang said, the bill deals with two aspects of federal-provincial relationships, but the relationship as between Ottawa and the provinces has radically changed by virtue of the statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on June 23.

The Leader of the Opposition in the other place and the NDP spokesmen dealt with the effect upon the social system, and deplored it, as I do. The Leader of the Opposition used the term "betrayal," and Mr. Tommy Douglas for the NDP said the government was "sabotaging medicare." As far as my own views are concerned, they are somewhere in between.

Senator Flynn: We always knew that.

Senator Croll: To the effects of that mini-budget, we now have added the effects of the mini-budget of the Government of Ontario, and the threats emanating therefrom. In this connection I should like to read you a few words from the Ottawa Citizen of July 12:

Mr. McKeough said he is sick and tired of Ottawa initiating shared-cost programs and then leaving the provinces to "carry on with reduced federal support." It won't happen again, he said.

There are 65 shared programs between the provinces and the federal government, with some of them being less important than others, but nevertheless, as Senator Grosart said, all the provinces have spoken in the same tone and to the same effect, and they are all feeling the same way. Keeping in mind that something we all want for this country is unity, and that that unity is vital for Canada, then one way of attaining that unity is by implementing common standards and common levels of health services across this country. The Liberal government until now has at times insisted, in some instances influenced, and sometimes has even compelled, national standards in the field of health and social welfare, old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, medicare, hospitalization, and health care. Of these Ottawa has always paid half the cost, and it was not always easy for the provinces.

This brings to mind the statement made in 1950 by a well-known premier, Joey Smallwood of Newfoundland, who spoke for the provinces when he said: "We can't turn down worthy programs when Ottawa is paying half the cost, but this doesn't mean we can afford the other half." I am not suggesting that my party has turned its back on the social security system, but it is looking away from what I consider to be its greatest achievement—medicare.

● (1450)

Allow me to give you a quote:

Health is not a privilege tied to the state of one's bank account, but rather a basic right which should be open to all.

The speaker was Allan MacEachen, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the date was July 12, 1966. Now, medicare, hospitalization and the health services cannot be sacrificed to our immediate financial problems. These problems come and these problems will go away, but medicare as a need and as a benefit will be with us from this day on. I have a particular affection for medicare.

If you do not mind, I will take a minute to tell you a story which you will find interesting. Medicare for me dates back many years. I was present when medicare was conceived, and I was present when it was achieved. The time lapse was 50 years. During those 50 years I nurtured it, supported it, and spoke on it perhaps a thousand times on a thousand different platforms, with ultimate success. In my opinion it is untouchable. Let me tell you how it came about.

Windsor is my home and I lived there during the first 40 years of my life, having arrived there at five years of age. I went to law school in Toronto, which was the only school there was at the time, and was active in college politics on the Liberal side. In those days we only knew two sides—Liberals and Conservatives. If a person was anything else, he was not recognized—in any event, there was not anything else. A Liberal convention was to be held in Toronto and, as usual, the riding organization had no money to send a delegate down and I was asked to be its delegate. I remember very well being the delegate from the riding and, as I said, I had been active politically. The meeting, as I recall, was held in the Foresters' Hall on College Street in Toronto in 1919, or perhaps 1920, when Mackenzie King introduced a resolution on national health insurance. You will appreciate that as far as I was concerned at that time it touched the hem of heaven. National health insurance—it was imaginative, and I was completely elated. I was very pleased when in 1969 I sat in this chamber and the bill which I had advocated throughout these many years was passed. I have always looked upon medicare as the diamond in the diadem of the great social mosaic of this country.

The social security system was built carefully, step by step. It began in 1925, with the Old Age Security Act, although we did have an annuity act in 1908. In 50 years we have built one of the best social security systems in the whole world. With the introduction of the guaranteed income for the working poor, which I hope will come soon, we will all have reason to be proud of what we have been able to achieve in 50 years. It has been a worthy concept.

Sometimes under these circumstances, when you have an opportunity to discuss it with those of us who have lived for many years, you must recall why we came here. I know why I went into public service. I remember from away back and I have not changed, because my dream was a just and compassionate society with national unity.

As I said, we built it step by step, slowly and meticulously, and it became the hallmark of Liberalism as far as I am concerned. It was our political calling card, and other parties contributed. We have now one of the best health services in the world. Would the Americans not love to be able to say that they had medicare for their people at the present time, for all of them, rather than what they have? To me and to all of us it is a matter of national pride and to proceed in any way at all that may erode the service would be a step backward.

What is contemplated by the mini-budget, in my opinion, may erode medicare. It certainly will diminish it; it will reduce it, both as to quantity and quality. It is wrong in concept; it is divisive in practice and, in my opinion, it is wrong, wrong, wrong, a thousand times wrong, for as far as I am concerned medicare is sacrosanct. Our medical benefits apply equally to all Canadians, no matter who they are or where they are. They are the envy of the world. They are very good, and we ought to be making them better. However, we have yet a distance to travel in order to achieve denticare, pharmlicare and legicare, which are all for the future. To limit ourselves, and declare that this is as far as we can go at any one time, is not at all the manner in which to deal with this very pressing problem. To cut the costs by making someone else pay them is only shifting costs. That is not efficiency, and it is not even fair play.

If Prince Edward Island can afford medicare, Ottawa can afford it. If Newfoundland can afford medicare, Ottawa can afford it. Both of those provinces assert that they can afford it, as do all the provinces. We are more particularly concerned with those provinces which are less rich. All we can possibly do if we follow the lead set forth in the mini-budget is to pass on the burden of health to the poor people who can least afford it. This involves giving them an inferior health service and raising the premium or incorporating deterrent fees. It is interesting to note that the British did not establish their deterrent fees until almost 50 years after their act came into effect, which was in 1914. Ours has been in effect for less than 10 years.

It is clear enough from Mr. MacEachen's statement made in 1966, which I read to you and with which we all agree, that medicare by purse was never intended. Health care in all its aspects is a continuous war against the unknown, from which none of us is immune. It is a preventive war, and it has to be defensive. It is on a continuous 24-hour-day basis.

● (1500)

I said earlier that in my view medicare is untouchable. Costs for all things go up, and costs for medicare will go up. But regardless of the cost of medicare, we have got to go first class. A country that is going to spend about $1 billion of Canadian wealth on the Olympics can afford medicare, first class.

Two entertainers gave performances at the Maple Leaf Gardens in Toronto a month or so ago, and left this country with $200,000. Of course, they had something taken off for taxation. Can we really claim that we cannot afford this very basic need?

None of us has forgotten what a lengthy illness used to do to families. All of us can recall what catastrophic illness did to generations of Canadian families. It pauperized and "poorized" people until medicare came along. It ill behooves us to save money by endangering lives. We say, "We have to take it easy, we have to go slowly, we have to wait." We badly need medicare and similar services, and hard days should not be inflicted upon those who can least cope with them.

When we first started on our social welfare program we thought it would be a method of redistribution of wealth. If we look at the statistics we will find that for about four or five years it did redistribute wealth. Then we were back to where we started. Why, I do not know. I do not think anyone knows why. The first half of the century was given over to the thought of making a just and compassionate society, and we all worked for it. We had a mission before us, and we have a mission before us now. That mission is to see that there is a redistribution of wealth in this country, and one of the ways of redistributing wealth is by providing ample social services. We may cut down in other ways, but the provision of social services should always be before us.

The gap between the rich and the poor has worsened. The share of the total income going to the poorest 20 per cent of the population dropped from 4.4 per cent in 1951 to 3.6 per cent in 1971. In the same period the share going to the richest 20 per cent of the population rose from 42.8 per cent to 43.3 per cent. Although the figures to date are not available, it appears that the rich are still gaining.

One of the things we should ask ourselves, in the quiet of the day or the night, is why we have made excuses for not spending more on the poor. Our excuses do not wash. For 20 years there has been extraordinary growth in this country, with increasing affluence for the average Canadian. We have had money to spare, but we have been unwilling to spend it on others whose need is greater. It was not the means that we lacked; it was the will. Yet in the first serious downturn of our economy we pick on the poor and the helpless. We did not give it to them when we had it, and we have no right to ask them to be the first to be sacrificed.

Good health is expensive. Yet, we have to go first class, or human casualties will be heavy. Health costs are rising, but the cost of everything is rising. One of the reasons for the increase in costs is that we have found it hard to say "This is it!" We still lack denticare, pharmacare and legicare, and other forms of care. When we complete the mosaic, that will be the time for us to evaluate. At present we are moving much too quickly to take advantage of those who can least defend themselves.

My purpose in speaking today is not to influence honourable senators with regard to the passage of this bill, because it will pass, but to influence their thinking when they deal with a medicare and hospitalization bill some time in the fall. I speak in the hope that the government and others will have second thoughts on this matter. The government is going the wrong way about it, and the stakes are too high. I hope the government will give this matter its consideration.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I had not anticipated speaking this afternoon. We have all listened with great care and attention to the compassionate appeal directed at us by Senator Croll, who has established an enviable reputation in all areas affecting the welfare of Canadians. We are grateful to him for his remarks.

I rise to provide certain assurances, not only to Senator Croll but other honourable senators who may be concerned about what has been construed to be a "trend" in this so-called mini-budget, which appears to go against the great program of reform, of extending human advantages, which has been characteristic of this government and predecessor Liberal governments.

It can be said that the government has, for the past five years, expended a great deal of effort to evolve a formula for putting some reasonable degree of control on the escalating costs of hospitalization, medicare and education. In some parts of Canada those costs are almost out of control. None of us can be unmindful of the fact that the national health program in Great Britain today is on the verge of bankruptcy. The situation in Great Britain is alarming. A number of commentators have stated that one of the causes has been the unwillingness to look at the plan squarely and objectively in past years, and attempt to make it more efficient. Now disaster is looming—substantial problems for millions of people in Great Britain—because obviously there will have to be a cutback in services.

A number of formulas have been advanced in this country to make medical and health programs more efficient. These have included incentives to the provinces to improve the efficiency of their medical deliveries. This government is not of the view that it simply fills in the amount on the cheques and sends them back to the provinces saying, "Look, whatever you want to spend on hospitalization or medicare is all right with us; we will pay 50 per cent. You send us the bills and we will send you the cheques." I suggest to you that it would not be acting in the best interests of Canada and Canadians, or the taxpayers of this country, to have that kind of loosely structured, irresponsible approach to hospitalization and medicare in this country.

● (1510)

Senator Grosart: It has taken you a long time to find that out.

Senator Perrault: The use of home clinics has been advanced by the federal government, the use of clinical supervision as opposed to acute hospital treatment for every type of malady. The fact is that in parts of Canada today there are thousands of patients occupying acute care beds at enormous per diem costs. Some of these people should be in chronic care facilities where they would be looked after just as well, if not better, at less cost. To this time, it has been very difficult, in some instances, for the federal government to initiate cooperative endeavours with the provinces to bring about the type of basic reforms in health and hospital care that we need. Acute care beds should be for people in acute need of medical attention—those in need of round-the-clock, highly skilled medical services. As I have said, there are thousands of people in Canada today occupying acute care beds who would be just as well or better off in chronic care facilities. Many of our older people are living out their lives in desperation in private nursing homes, some of which simply cannot provide the quality of service to which these senior citizens are entitled. It is not the direction of government policy to withdraw anything. Rather, it is an effort to deliver more efficiently the humanitarian services required by people in all parts of this country, and to assist those people in greatest need.

The use of paramedical services, when they can be safely used instead of the services of doctors, is an area into which some of the provinces have been very reluctant to move. Yet the use of such services is characteristic of medical services in many parts of the world today. It is shocking to realize that there are parts of Canada where there is an absolute shortage of doctors. You know those areas, and I know them. It is impossible, for example, for citizens in certain communities in this country to get dental care and medical care although their taxes have helped to pay for the training of Canada's doctors and dentists. They are entitled to a better deal from governments at all levels than they are getting.

The distribution of services must be improved. There are remote areas of Canada where no dentists are to be found. To cite one example, the last dentist moved out of one of our communities in northern British Columbia a few months ago. We have to do something about this situation federally and provincially, and if it means sending paramedical teams to some of the more remote areas of Canada—trained people who can diagnose and treat illness and then, if necessary, direct the people in need of more professional care, more advanced care, to centres where that care is available—then we should establish that kind of service.

But the federal government is doing no service to the taxpayers or the ill people of this country merely by unquestioningly filling in blank cheques and shipping money out to the provinces. This is the essence of what this particular aspect of the so-called mini-budget is all about when it talks in terms of re-assessing the federal relationship to hospital and medical care in this country. We are going to continue to cooperate with the provinces—and I say this on behalf of the government—but to help contain the escalation of health costs within the growth of the economy as a whole. I am proud of the fact—and I think we are all proud of the fact—that Canada has one of the best hospital programs and medical care programs in the world. We need not apologize for the standard of care which we have established, although much remains to be done.

In recent years, this country's health care costs have grown at a rate well above the rate of growth in the economy as a whole.

Senator Grosart: So has federal government spending.

Senator Perrault: The rate of increase in federal government spending has not been nearly as great as it has been in the province of Ontario, which has been under Conservative direction for so many years.

Senator Grosart: Not so.

Senator Perrault: When we review the way money is being spent on health services in Canada, when some people in government question the efficiency of programs, such as the Unemployment Insurance Program, that is not to say we are attacking the poor, those who are indigent, or those who are in need of health care.

Senator Flynn: Or work.

Senator Perrault: The government, I think, has a right and a duty to look with a critical eye at all of these programs to make sure that every dollar spent is directed as efficiently as possible to those who really need help. That is the essence of it. If we do not do that, then we are guilty of a great disservice to the people of Canada.

Senator Grosart: It must have been that way for years.

Senator Perrault: We in government believe that without reducing in any way—I repeat, without reducing in any way—universal, complete hospital and medical services to Canadians, wherever they live, we can re-examine these programs. We can look at them, and assess their value and their efficacy. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will give that undertaking again when the appropriate bill comes before Parliament in the near future.

I repeat, without derogating from the principle of complete and all-embracing medical and hospital costs, we believe there are more efficient and less costly ways of delivering these services to the people of Canada. I think there are very few taxpayers in this country who would disagree with that approach. Surely, the activity of government is not to give a blank cheque to medicine, to management, to labour, to agriculture, or any other sector of society, especially at this time when we have inflation and when taxpayers' dollars have to be expended as efficiently as possible.

I want to assure honourable senators that while all of us must be concerned about those less fortunate in society, and those in legitimate need of assistance, whether in the area of unemployment or health delivery, and so forth, there is no intention on the part of the government to march backwards. The intention is to march forward, and to march forward with dollars marshalled to provide the needed services for Canadians, wherever they live in this country. Some of them are not getting the standard of service and efficiency to which they are entitled as Canadian citizens and taxpayers.

In a few weeks from now, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, will bring proposals before Parliament. I think those proposals will definitely put to rest any fears that any honourable senators may have felt this afternoon about the proposal before us.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Lang speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, there is nothing further I wish to add.

Senator Croll: That is the best speech made today.
Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I assume it is the wish of the Senate that this bill be referred to committee. I might point out that when the original bill was before this chamber it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In the present circumstances—namely, the time limitation under which we are working, the availability of committees and the precedent we have in this regard—I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

OLYMPIC (1976) ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved the second reading of Bill C-63, to amend the Olympic (1976) Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is an amendment to the Olympic (1976) Act that we passed two years ago. I should like at the outset to make it perfectly clear that the present bill, which amends sections 3 and 4 of the Olympic (1976) Act, does not change, directly or indirectly, the written and clear agreement reached originally between the Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec, COJO and the City of Montreal.

Honourable senators will remember that when I sponsored the Olympic (1976) Act in July, 1973, I tabled copies of three letters, which appeared as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of that day. These letters show in the clearest terms that, apart from the specific programs covered by the Olympic (1976) Act, COJO, the City of Montreal and the Government of Quebec cannot expect any direct financial contribution from the federal government before, during and after these games if ever the expenditures exceed the revenues. In other words, one of the conditions under which the federal government passed the Olympic (1976) Act was that under no circumstances would it accept responsibility for any deficit, or difference between the expenditures and the revenues resulting from these games.

That having been said, Bill C-63 must be considered in the same light. It is an extension of the coin selling program; the addition of gold coins on the market will work along the same lines as the silver coins, and in fact will not cost the federal Treasury one cent. However, the net profit for COJO—I am always afraid of venturing to speak about profit or deficit—is expected to be in the neighbourhood of $25 million if this gold coin sale venture works as is hoped.

Honourable senators will remember that under the original budget presented by COJO, the expenditures forecast amounted to around $310 million, of which $250 million was to cover capital costs and $60 million operating costs, excluding of course the cost of the Olympic Village.

With respect to revenues, it was generally expected that about $20 million would come from ticket sales, TV rights and so forth, and that most of the revenue would flow from the sale of commemorative coins and stamps. It was reasonably confidently felt that more than $250 million could be obtained from this program of coin sales. It is to be noted that for the Olympic Games in Munich, the revenue from coin sales was about $230 million, but it was found from our experience that the market in Germany is not similar to the Canadian market.

Under the Olympic (1976) Act there are also, of course, the lotteries, whose results were not expected to be what have been achieved. It must be said that the results have been tremendous. For the information of senators, may I say that for the last lottery about six million tickets were sold at $10 a ticket, producing a revenue of $60 million, and about 40 per cent of this amount went to COJO as net profit.

Senator Flynn: Is that $28 million?

Senator Deschatelets: It is $24 million or $25 million. If the costs and expenditures could have been kept at the level forecast in the original budget presented by COJO, the present bill would not have been necessary. Because of the tremendous installation costs and operating costs it is perfectly clear today that unless new programs are put into operation there will, at the end of the line, be a deficit, or whatever you like to call it, of at least $300 million between the total costs and total revenues.

Senator Croll: What would you like to call it?

Senator Flynn: A difference.

Senator Deschatelets: Let us call it a difference, or, as Mayor Drapeau would say, un écart, the meaning of which in English I do not know.

Except from what I read in the papers—it might be the same for other honourable senators—I have no specific information or knowledge of any reason or facts that can satisfactorily explain the tremendous increase in the cost of these games. Your explanation is as good as mine. It is reasonable to think, however, that general inflation, the several strikes that have hit Montreal and the Quebec territory, coupled with very low productivity on the working site, are some of the reasons, plus—

Senator Flynn: Inflation.

Senator Deschatelets: —the fact that because of the target date of July 1976, the public tender system had to be put aside. At any rate, honourable senators are aware that all details of costs and expenditures are now being examined in depth by a parliamentary commission of the Assemblée Nationale in Quebec, reports of which appear in the papers these days.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, the cold fact is that other sources of revenue must be found. That is the reason for the introduction of this bill. Section 3 of the Olympic (1976) Act is therefore amended by this bill to permit the issue and sale of gold coins of $100, commemorating the Olympic Games and bearing the date 1976. I think one of the purposes of this is that after the Games this will be the end of this program.

Like the silver coins now on sale, these gold coins will be legal tender if made for payment of an amount not exceeding $100, but for no greater amount. It is therefore a complementary program to the existing one and will be operated along the same lines as far as marketing is concerned.

It is proposed to strike or mint two gold coins, one which will contain half an ounce of gold and intended primarily for the numismatic market, for those who collect coins as a hobby or speculation. These coins containing one half ounce of gold will be treated carefully by the Mint with special striking and polishing. The cost of the gold will be the market price at the time of production, and not $42 per ounce, which is the official price.

Senator Flynn: What is that?

Senator Deschatelets: As honourable senators know, there are two gold prices, the official price of $42 an ounce, and the price on the free market, which might be $160 today and $170 tomorrow. The gold for the making of these coins will come from the Treasury, but at the free market price on the day the coins go into production. This means that the $100 coin containing half an ounce of gold will have a value in gold of $80 if the price on that date is $160 an ounce.

Senator Flynn: It will sell for how much, $135?

Senator Deschatelets: Nothing has been decided so far. I am reluctant to go into these details, but I might try to guess. The coin containing one-half ounce of gold might sell for about $158. This is a guess. The other coin, which will contain a quarter of an ounce of gold—and of course the weight will be less than the other and there will be a difference in the polishing—might go on the market for a little above $100, perhaps $115. But that is only a guess; do not ask me to justify this.

Senator Flynn: Its market value would be only $40 in gold?

Senator Macdonald: It will be legal tender.

Senator Flynn: I know, but on the free market it would be worth only $42.

Senator Deschatelets: In terms of value of gold, that is right. The second coin, which will be a circulating coin, will be a little different from the other—in weight at least. The legislation passed in 1973 set a maximum of $450 million as the total amount of all Olympic coins issued or sold, and it is to be noted that this maximum remains unchanged under the bill before us. This includes the whole coin program, including silver and gold coins. In other words, should the sale be what we hope and should it reach $450 million, the federal government will not issue any coins beyond that amount.

This additional coin program will not cost the federal Treasury a cent, and only the net proceeds will be paid to COJO. In fact, the gold coming from the Treasury at $42 per ounce will sell at the free price, around $160, and this will represent, in the conversion, a surplus of about $20 million for the Treasury. But I leave it to you to figure whether this is a real profit or not. At any rate, one thing is sure—there will be no loss. This program will not cost us one cent.

Senator Flynn: Could it not be arranged that all government programs wouldn't cost us a cent?

Senator Deschatelets: My honourable friend may think I am speaking as Mayor Drapeau speaks. I am limiting my remarks to the gold coin program.

The second feature of the bill is an amendment to section 4 of the Olympic (1976) Act, which grants the Olympic Games Organization Committee exclusive rights in trade marks and copyright. This amendment will provide COJO with the legal protection necessary to carry out its licence granting program. It is expected that a sum of $20 million to $25 million might be derived from this source. I am told that they have already received about $15 million through the sale of these trade marks, and so on. I must say that this protection on trade marks and copyright is completely similar, if not identical, to the clause in the act covering Expo 67.

Senator Choquette: May I ask at this point what is the design to be? Has it been chosen? Is it the same as on the 50-cent piece? What is the picture on it? Is it going to be just one standard? Can we be told about that?

Senator Deschatelets: I should be in a position to answer such a question, and if my good friend will wait I will provide him with the information during the course of this debate. I know that both coins will have the same design, but the weight of one coin will be greater than that of the other. I would like to have a complete answer, and if my friend will give me time I will answer it later.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, beyond the support to the Olympics of the revenue-generating programs, it is fair, I think, to point out the support which has been provided by the federal government through normal programs involving about 30 different departments and agencies of the federal government, without which these games could not take place. Let me mention briefly the following programs: (1) assistance to Canadian athletes through the Department of National Health and Welfare for grants which represent, for this year only, $2 million. (2) funds for training of competent officials and judges and other programs by Canada Manpower Centres which will cost an estimated $1.6 million. (3) under the auspices of the Department of the Environment, and through the Department of Public Works, works have been undertaken at Kingston to provide a breakwater and to deepen the harbour for the Olympic sailing events. This will cost at least $800,000. (4) planning is underway by the RCMP and provincial and municipal police departments as well as the Department of National Defence for security arrangements for the duration of the Olympics. The total cost for the security should reach about $80 million involving approximately 10,000 men, primarily from the RCMP and the Department of National Defence. (5) $1 million has been approved for the Department of the Secretary of State to allow for travel, accommodation and performance of Canadian artists who will participate in a cultural festival to be held simultaneously with the Olympics. (6) the federal government will also spend $25 million by way of supplementary funds to the CBC, the host broadcaster during the Olympics. The broadcasting of the events will cost approximately $56 million. The difference will be paid by COJO and foreign broadcasters. (7) at COJO's request the National Film Board will produce the official film of the 1976 Olympic Games. The National Film Board will spend about $300,000 of its budget for that purpose. That film will be used for social, cultural and educational purposes. (8) the cooperation of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the construction of the Olympic Village where about 10,000 athletes and officials will reside during these games.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have just given you the most rudimentary information on this bill. I read Hansard concerning the debate in the other place, as well as the report on the committee stage.

I believe I can say that, with regard to the official Opposition, they agreed on the principle of the bill but that the discussions bore only on the technical aspects involved in issuing the two Olympic coins.

I do not know whether honourable senators wish to send this bill to committee. We will hear whatever they may have to say. If some feel that it might be a good idea to do so, then I shall act accordingly at the end of the debate.

Honourable senators, I submit this bill to your attention. Personally, I believe we should pass it because, in fact, it will cost the government nothing, nor the Treasury; yet, on the other hand it may bring COJO some $20 million of which, it would seem, it is in dire need.

Senator Flynn: May I put a question to the mover of the bill?

Did he have the opportunity of meeting Mayor Drapeau last week, and did the Mayor give him either arguments or information that might be useful to this bill?

Senator Deschatelets: The answer is no, neither here nor elsewhere.

[English]

Honourable senators, I should now like to reply to a question of Senator Choquette with respect to the design of the coins. The designs have not yet been selected. They are to be commissioned as soon as the bill receives royal assent. With respect to the size of the coins, the "proof-like," consisting of one-half ounce of gold, will be one inch in diameter and .075 of an inch thick. The "circulating quality," consisting of one-fourth of an ounce of gold, will be 1.1 inches in diameter and .067 of an inch thick.

Senator Buckwold: If I may ask a question, what quantity of gold in ounces is it estimated will be required for this program, and what effect will the presumably large market demand have on the price of gold in terms of the world price of gold? Does the mover of the bill feel that this could have a serious impact on the long-term economy of the country?

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, it would be difficult for me to answer that most important question at the moment. If my honourable friend will allow me, I will take his question as notice and I will compile as complete an answer as possible for tomorrow. Is that satisfactory?

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

[Senator Deschatelets.]

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. J. J. Greene moved the second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I will not fall into the same pit one of my honourable colleagues fell into a while back by saying that this is a simple bill, but I will say that there are no momentous changes in it. This is essentially the act originally propounded in the other place under the administration of the right honourable member for Prince Albert. Whatever may have been the shortcomings of that administration, this act was not one of them, and that administration deserves a great deal of credit for having promulgated it in 1958. This time we are attempting to bring the terms of that act up to date in keeping with the needs of the agricultural community and the Canadian public in general.

● (1550)

One thing that does disturb me, honourable senators, about measures which attempt to assure the stability and economic well-being of our agricultural community is that they are ever stigmatized, particularly in the metropolitan press, as providing a handout to the farmers. I suggest that nothing could be further from the truth. Those who have the greatest interest in a sound and healthy agricultural community are the consumers, the urban dwellers. Without a sound, efficient and thriving agricultural community, the cost of food would soar well beyond even that which is the case today. So it is the consumers of Canada who benefit most if the agricultural community gets a just award for efficient productivity.

If the great farm lands of this country gradually become uneconomic for farming, and they are turned into industrial, commercial or even residential land, then I suggest it will be the urban dweller—the consumer of agricultural products—who will suffer the most. In a larger sense, surely more than ever, the words of John Donne are true—no man is an island, and no country is an island. If there is one person in this whole wide world short of food, then surely we, who are blessed with unbounded resources in agriculture, including the most efficient agricultural producers in the world, have a duty to produce, and to see to it that our agricultural community has every incentive to achieve the greatest productivity so that the needs of the world at large for food may be met.

Honourable senators, the instability of farm gate prices has always been a source of worry and frustration to Canadian farmers. Fluctuating prices make it hard for the farmer to plan ahead. Too often top prices in one year are followed by rock bottom prices in the next.

Instability of prices, I suggest, is also a source of frustration for the consumer. Everyone likes a bargain, and it is nice to go into the store one day and find that egg prices have dropped, or that carrots or potatoes are at an especially low price. However, I submit that the consumers are intelligent enough to know that their best long-term interests lie in stable food prices which allow the producer to make an honest dollar on his investment and from his labour.

The legislation we are dealing with today is a major advance in national farm policy. It is also a solid plank in the national food policy, which is one of the commitments of the federal government as outlined in the Throne Speech.

As I said, serious efforts to stabilize the agricultural industry began in 1958 with the passage of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and the formation of the Agricultural Stabilization Board to administer that act. That act and that board, I think, are a monument to the then Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Douglas Harkness, who deserves a great deal of credit for bringing this measure into law.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear!

Senator Greene: Thanks to the dedication and foresight of the members of that board over the years, the act has been made to work well in the interests of Canadian farmers and Canadian consumers. It has taken some of the ups and downs out of prices, has helped to give farmers a stable income, and consumers a reliable supply of agricultural produce from the farms of Canada.

The present period of international economic uncertainty and inflation, both at home and abroad, makes the need for stability in the agricultural industry that much more important. The legislation we are dealing with today, Bill C-50, an act to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, is a response to the need for a more flexible and effective tool for providing farmers with the assurance that they will be able to meet their costs of production.

Since this legislation was first introduced last February it has been the subject of considerable and very lengthy debate in the other place, in committee, and in the press, so I am sure honourable senators are well aware of its contents. I would just like to summarize its major provisions, and perhaps make one or two comments on their significance.

As all of us are painfully aware, prices in recent years have been going up at an alarming rate. This has hit the farmer in two ways, for he must not only buy the normal consumer goods that all of us purchase, but he must buy the materials necessary to run his farm operation—live-stock feed, fertilizers, pesticides, bailer twine, machinery, and fuel to run those machines. So the first and most important change that Bill C-50 makes is to attach a cost of production formula to the base price of each commodity to which the stabilization program will apply.

Secondly, and of equal importance for the same reason—that is, inflation—the support price will be 90 per cent of the weighted average price over the previous five years. Honourable senators can readily see, I think, that the previous formula, which was 80 per cent of the average over the previous ten years, would, in a period of inflation, leave the farmer with an unrealistically low support level. Some suggest a shorter period of, say, two years, on which to formulate the support level. Such a measure could find the farmers faced with a support price based only on the bottom figure of a price cycle. I should point out that the 90 per cent figure is not the maximum support level, but the minimum. The nine major commodities named in the act must be supported at not less than that level. Higher support levels can be set under the act where conditions warrant it.

I referred to the nine commodities named in the act. These are cattle, hogs, sheep, industrial milk and cream, corn and soybeans, and oats and barley marketed outside the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. This is a slight change from the present act. Eggs have been deleted because they are adequately covered by the supply management program operated by the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, which functions under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. Butter and cheese are now included under the general heading of industrial milk and cream, a change which gives the Canadian Dairy Commission more flexibility in administering its dairy support program. Corn and soybeans have been added because these crops are taking on an increasingly important role in the feed and oil industries.

Wheat outside the Canadian Wheat Board's jurisdiction has been deleted, honourable senators will note, because producers of wheat in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes now are assured of a minimum price under the Two-Price Wheat Act. That act has already been put to work.

Last week the Department of Agriculture forwarded some $17 million in subsidies on grain sold for domestic milling. Although the money goes to the farmers, it is in reality a consumer subsidy. By fixing the price of wheat at $3.25 a bushel to the miller, the consumer is assured a stable price for bread and other bakery products.

● (1600)

Oats and barley are included because, under the new feed grain policy, much of that grain formerly sold only by the wheat board is now sold on the open market.

I would like to stress here, honourable senators, that this act is not limited to those commodities named and which I have enumerated. While the government must support those commodities, the act provides the flexibility for support programs to be applied to any farm commodity whenever conditions indicate that stabilization is necessary.

Flexibility is one of the key items in this legislation, and there are three other ways in which its flexibility will work to the benefit of Canadian farmers.

First, there is flexibility in the operation of the plans. It provides for provincial and/or producer participation in the programs to suit the type of support scheme to the special needs of the producers.

Second, this act now allows for regional stabilization programs. While programs for nationally produced and nationally marketed products must of necessity be national in character, there are some commodities which have a regional market. It would be unfortunate, for example, if Eastern potato growers were denied a support program just because Western producers were enjoying a good year; or if British Columbia apple growers could not get help just because Nova Scotia growers had marketed their crop at good prices.

Third, there is now flexibility in the type of support programs that may be used. Although it is anticipated that deficiency payments, purchase programs and direct payments to producers will remain the most common means of stabilizing prices, the government, under this bill, will have the flexibility to use other means if they seem desirable.

In closing, let me just say that this legislation will mean that commodities representing 88 per cent of all farm cash income will be covered by some type of government support. These programs are designed to encourage efficiency and productivity. We want no part of subsidizing inefficiency, and neither do the Canadian farmers.

Canadian farmers are among the most efficient and productive in the world. The stability that this legislation will bring to the industry will encourage them to do the long-range planning and investment that will make their operations even more efficient, to the benefit of the consumer and the benefit of a world very badly in need of food.

Honourable senators, I respectfully suggest that if this bill receives second reading it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, where I hope it will receive thorough examination and swift passage so that the Canadian farmer may get the benefits of the 1958 legislation extended to cover his 1975 needs.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all grateful to Senator Greene for his clear and concise explanation of this bill. Actually this bill has had rather a long and difficult passage since it was given first reading in the House of Commons back in February of this year. There has been a great deal of discussion of it; many speeches were made on every stage. The Agriculture Committee of the House of Commons met 16 times to discuss it. After going over the provisions of the bill it is rather difficult to see why these amendments should have generated such discussion because, as was mentioned by the sponsor, the provisions are clear and there are not too many changes from the original act. Indeed, the bill consists of only seven clauses, and these are mostly for the purpose of bringing up to date the provisions of the Agricultural Stabilization Act as passed in 1958.

In order to see just what that act was meant to do, and indeed did do, and to see what these amendments mean to do, I looked at the preamble to the original act. It states the aims of the legislation in a very clear and concise manner, and indeed justifies the bill now under discussion because it seeks to guarantee that the purposes of the original act shall be accomplished under new conditions. That preamble, as found in Chapter A-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, reads as follows:

Whereas it is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income—

That, honourable senators, was the purpose of the original act, and I think the need to make amendments to bring it up to date, as it were, is obvious. It is obvious that the costs of production rose sharply over the past few years. Indeed, the increase in the cost of production to the farmers has been so large that the average market price over the past ten years, as set out in the original act, cannot give the desired results. So while the present act has given good and valuable service, it can no longer protect farm income on the commodities mentioned in it, and it can no longer assure the farmer of a fair return for his labour and on his investment. It is now necessary to make such changes in the act as will give the farmer such a fair return. And, of course, it is necessary to give such a return not only to protect farm income, but also to make sure that there will be sufficient production of these commodities to fill the demand for them. In other words, the floor price must be raised, and this is what the bill seeks to do.

As mentioned by the sponsor of this bill, under the present act, Chapter A-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, a deficiency payment is made to the farmer producing the commodities covered by the act if the market price in any one year is less than 80 per cent of the average price over the past ten years. This is changed by the bill so that the base price in any year shall be the average price at representative markets, as determined by the board, for the past preceding five years. This, in effect, provides that the prescribed price also shall be 90 per cent or higher, as the Governor in Council may decide, of the base price.

There appears to have been general agreement that these two amendments are worthwhile. They have drawn general support. However, the proposed section 8.2 goes further, because it reads as follows:

8.2(1) The prescribed price of an agricultural commodity in a year shall be,

(a) in relation to a named commodity, the amount obtained by adjusting ninety per cent, or such higher percentage as the Governor in Council may prescribe, of the base price thereof for the year by an index calculated in such manner as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council to reflect the estimated production costs of the commodity in the year as compared with the average of production costs for the five years immediately preceding the year—

• (1610)

This clause was subjected to considerable criticism because it was felt to be too vague. The index is to be calculated in such manner as is determined by the Governor in Council. It was also felt it left too much to the discretion of the Governor in Council. True, the new section 8.2(2) does say the Governor in Council shall be guided by the recommendations of the board made pursuant to section 7(1), but it adds "and such other factors as the Governor in Council considers to be relevant." I think it has to be admitted the subsection is vague, and consequently producers have a valid criticism as they have no way of knowing in advance the extent of the deficiency payment over the 90 per cent if production costs continue to advance.

Then there is the further question of just what will constitute production costs. You will remember that in the bill dealing with the two-price wheat system it was claimed there could not be an escalator clause as the costs of production could not be accurately ascertained due to various circumstances, and due also to the fact that Statistics Canada could not give an accurate figure for increased production costs for wheat being used only for human consumption, though it could give such a figure for agricultural costs as a whole. So in this bill there is no attempt made to provide a formula to estimate increased production costs, but it is left to the Governor in Council to use whatever guidelines, if any, he cares to use.

While it is stated that the Governor in Council shall be guided by the recommendations of the board, yet the addition of the words in the new section 8.2(2), "and such other factors as the Governor in Council considers to be relevant," does, I think, wholly offset whatever recommendations the board may make, and enables the Governor in Council to disregard a specific recommendation of the board.

While this matter was thoroughly discussed before the bill came to this chamber, there were yet other objections. One of these, although not relating directly to the objectives of the bill, was the question of what is called "supply management." When discussing the bill, the Minister of Agriculture made the statement that none of these farm programs can work without supply management. Now, the term "supply management" is simply a fancy name for controlled production, a production which some person, board or committee decides will supply the demand, and the producers will be told how much of such commodities they can produce. And, of course, this is advocated with the best of motives.

From what I have read I believe the minister's position is that farmers should produce the commodities in question in just sufficient quantities to fill an assured market at a price which will give them a fair return for their labour and investment. Others took an opposite approach and, as can be expected when a question of great principle is involved, emotions came into play. The principle expounded by the critics of the minister is that the production of food should be encouraged, the estimated market at a reasonable price should not be the guiding standard, and certainly the supply management idea should not be even considered. These people felt that farm production should be encouraged, and the increased production disposed of by an accelerated sales policy.

The advocates on both sides of the question were in agreement that the producer must receive a fair return for his product. I think it is fair to say that the advocates of encouraging production felt it was repugnant to our feeling for humanity to deliberately limit the production of food when so many people in the world are hungry. And yet it cannot be expected that the producers of food should bear the cost of assistance to peoples less fortunate than ourselves. To be practical, I can see and appreciate the position of the Minister of Agriculture as he is concerned for the immediate welfare of, and financial returns to, the farmer, but I do believe the growing of food should be encouraged as I am convinced the Canadian people—all of them—would be prepared to pay the cost of all surplus food that might be produced, and then give it as a gift to help feed the hungry.

Honourable senators, supply management, of course, is not a subject which could be decided by this bill. However, I do think it contains an element of such control. In the section dealing with regulations it is stated in section 11(a) that the Governor in Council may make regulations establishing ceilings on the quantity or value of an agricultural commodity eligible for price stabilization under this act. In effect this clause could be used to control supply.

It was interesting to note the attitude of the various farm organizations to the bill. Generally speaking, they did approve of its provisions, though with reservations. However, the National Farmers Union stated that a formula indexing all the major cost components is required to establish an adequate price stabilization program. It felt a base price should be established at a given date on actual costs of production in each region, and support prices adjusted quarterly to reflect changes. Some organizations felt the bill did not go far enough, while others thought it went too far toward controlling prices.

Some believed that more commodities should be listed in clause 1(1)(a) of the bill, even though under clause 1(1)(b) any other commodity can be brought under the act by the Governor in Council. The objection to this procedure is that representations will have to be made to the Governor in Council, and this could be time-consuming and often frustrating. An additional objection is that under clause 4 of the bill the added commodity is only covered for that particular year.

It is interesting to note also that there still appears to be a dislike, even a distrust, by the farm organizations of too much government direction in the marketing practices of the agricultural industry. Indeed, some take the position they do not want a stabilization program which will give assistance above what they call a "stop loss level". In other words, the deficiency payment would only cover the actual cost of production, and leave no room for any profit. The producer would not lose any money on the operation, but he would not make any either. The fear was expressed that if the deficiency payment was above the stop loss level overproduction would result, and the producers would no longer have clear economic signals from the market place—whatever that may mean.

In any event, honourable senators, the fear of overproduction was heightened by the provision in the bill, under clause 6, which allows what is called "top loading." All this means is that a province or the producers, or both, can give the producer an extra payment over and above the payment made by the board. In fact, I believe this is now done by a couple of provinces. This top loading provision was a cause of concern because another provision of the bill, clause 1(4), provides that the powers of the board may be exercised in relation to an agricultural product not only throughout Canada but also in any region of Canada if, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, the market situation for an agricultural commodity in that region is substantially different from the market situation in the rest of Canada.

The example used to show what is meant is the production of potatoes in the Maritime provinces. This provision was, I think, acknowledged to have a very worthy objective, and should prove of value in the future. But the fear was expressed that its value could be overcome, and indeed rendered useless, if a province outside the region decided to use this top loading provision to provide its producers with a payment higher than the board payment to the region, and thus allow them to undersell. This concern was overcome, at least to some extent, by an amendment to clause 6 of the bill whereby the Governor in Council can only authorize the board to enter into an agreement with a province regarding top loading under certain conditions and safeguards.

Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary to consider this bill at any great length. The sponsor gave a very clear explanation of its objectives, so I do not think it is necessary to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture although, of course, some senators may desire further information on some aspect which the sponsor cannot be expected to give at this time. I refer those wishing to know something of the cost of this program to the annual report of the Agricultural Stabilization Board, which came out a few days ago.

● (1620)

I agree with the sponsor that this is no handout. Those who produce our food are certainly entitled to a fair return on their labour and investment. Personally I have often wondered why they have not used their economic strength over the years to see that they did get a proper return for what they produced.

Before resuming my seat, I would like to make one short observation on agriculture legislation in general. I consulted the index of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and under the heading "Agriculture" I saw listed 31 statutes directly concerned with agriculture. With such a mass of separate legislation it is most difficult to obtain even an adequate knowledge of agriculture legislation, let alone become wholly familiar with it. I suggest that the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice get together to see if there can be a consolidation of a number of these statutes, otherwise the situation will worsen as the years go by.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to support the bill. I hope it will have speedy passage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Greene moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill S-28, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-28, which I have the honour to sponsor, seeks to make certain amendments to the act under which the Royal Canadian Legion operates.

The Royal Canadian Legion is a household name in Canada. As of December 31, 1974 the total membership of all categories numbered 450,000. All legionnaires, and many non-legionnaires, will be interested in the amendments contained in the bill. In order that they might be more easily understood by those who will follow this debate through Senate Hansard, I propose to begin by giving a brief outline of the history of the Royal Canadian Legion, its organization and accomplishments.

Prior to World War I, the armed services in Canada were represented by regimental associations, by scattered units of various types, and by one Dominion organization—the Army and Navy Veterans of Canada. Membership in these groups was limited, and for the most part restricted to large urban centres. Their activities were devoted largely to discussion of service, national functions and assisting needy comrades in distress.

Canada was quite unprepared for the rehabilitation problems which arose at the end of World War I. Some idea of the immensity of the problems is indicated by the fact that more than 600,000 men saw service, nearly 60,000 were killed in action, 138,000 were wounded, and some 130,000 were discharged medically unfit as a result of their service. But what the government suffered from most was lack of experience in dealing with those problems. The veterans, upon whose advice the government depended, lacked organization. The result was confusion. The government had to start from scratch with regard to war pension administration.

Under such complicated conditions some 14 or 15 national veterans' groups sprang up between 1917 and 1925. They had no united voice or effort. Attempts were made to coordinate their activities, but each group's objectives were different from those of the others and they appeared to work at cross purposes.

In 1925 the Dominion Veterans Alliance came into existence, spurred on by the plea of one man in particular—Field Marshal Earl Haig of Bemerseyde, Commander in Chief of the British Armies. Having had experience with the growing pains of the British Legion, he was invited to attend, as guest speaker, a convention of all veterans' organizations in Ottawa.

In November 1925, all organizations met in Winnipeg for a "Unity Conference." The inspiration and dedication of men such as Earl Haig and General Sir Richard Turner bore fruit. The Legion was born, and by July 1926 was self-supporting.

From its inception, the Legion quite naturally concerned itself primarily with the battle for adequate pensions and other benefits for war veterans, and the dependents of those who lost their lives as the result of war. Beneficial changes were effected, but the depression of the 1930s created a host of new problems. The Legion was continuously involved, in both local endeavours and national undertakings, in efforts to improve the desperate conditions of veterans in most of Canada. A significant development in this period was the introduction of the War Veterans Allowance Act in 1930, which benefited those veterans who were unable to qualify for disability pension under the Pensions Act but who nevertheless had become incapacitated because of their war service.

With the advent of World War II, the Legion was revitalized by the demands made upon it, and by the influx of new members. Efforts during and immediately after the war were prodigious. Canadian Legion war services provided amenities such as entertainment, canteens, et cetera, for serving men at both home and abroad, including those at the battle fronts. Canadian Legion educational services provided correspondence courses and tutors to prepare serving men for their return to civilian life.

Concurrently with these programs the Legion was involved in a substantial way in the promotion of the most comprehensive rehabilitation program offered by any government to its men returning from the war—namely, the Veterans' Charter. The many acts that made up this charter covered practically every aspect of the ex-serviceman's life—his education, medical treatment, employment, land settlement, vocational training, as well as the more conventional benefits such as disability pensions. The university training program provided an opportunity for thousands of returning veterans to gain professional status, and had, we believe, a marked impact on all aspects of Canadian life in the ensuing years.

The adoption of the Veterans' Charter did not mean that the Legion's task was complete—far from it. In the succeeding years, improved benefits were sought, particularly in regard to disability and death pensions, war veterans' allowances, and widows' pensions and allowances.

● (1630)

During the 1960s an investigating committee, the Woods Committee, studied in great depth the Pension Act and the operations of the Pensions Commission. The Legion, together with other veterans' organizations, made many comprehensive presentations to that committee, seeking a whole variety of improvements in the legislation. In March 1971, a completely new Pension Act came into force.

Through a further study undertaken jointly by the veterans' organizations and the government, a satisfactory new basis for upgrading pension rates was introduced in July 1973. This took into account the relationship of war pensions to public service salaries, as well as the previously adopted indexing using the consumer price index.

These objectives accomplished, the Legion then sought new themes and new objectives. It did not forget its responsibilities to the veteran. It simply expanded its endeavours to encompass community development, physical fitness, housing for the aged, education and leadership. In particular, its involvement with the development in youth leadership has and will continue to reap rich rewards in Canada's future.

Of great significance is its development of senior citizen housing in Canada. The Legion has sponsored over 50 such housing projects.

For many years, with the assistance of the federal government, the Legion organized the Royal Canadian Legion Sports Training Plan, which included national clinics for track and field coaches, as well as young athletes. More than 1,300 coaches and thousands of young athletes received the benefit of these programs under the direction of the world renowned Geoffrey Dyson, former British national coach. The Legion recognized the need for Canadian texts and periodicals on track and field and published the Coaching Review, a track and field annual. During this period, the Canadian Track and Field Association records that applications increased from 40 to well over 600 a year. Today the Legion is involved in community programs as diverse as Canada's geography and climate, being geared to individual communities and reflecting the character of those communities.

The Royal Canadian Legion derives its authority and carries out its operations from its act of incorporation, Statutes of Canada, 1948, Chapter 84, as amended. From this act are drawn the general by-laws; from the general by-laws are drawn the provincial command by-laws; and from the provincial by-laws the branch by-laws.

The primary unit is the branch, and there are some 1,800 branches in Canada. A number of branches form a zone; a number of zones form a district; and a number of districts, usually within a province but not necessarily so, form a provincial command. Branches and provincial commands exercise autonomy in regard to their own affairs, but within the general by-laws and in the area of their jurisdiction. Provincial conventions are usually held annually or biennially. Branch delegates to these conventions elect a slate of officers. From these provincial command officers, either by election or nomination, is formed the Dominion Executive Council, the governing body of the Legion between biennial Dominion conventions.

The Dominion convention is the ultimate governing body of the Legion. During this convention, branch delegates decide, by majority vote, the policy of the Legion, and elect a slate of officers at the Dominion level. This group becomes the sub-executive committee of council. It consists of the immediate past president, president, first vice-president, four vice-presidents and the treasurer, and is charged with the responsibility for the day-to-day administration of the Legion. Dominion command Headquarters is in Legion House in Ottawa, and it has a paid staff of 60 employees.

The Legion is a non-profit, dues-supported organization. It receives no financial support from outside agencies. A per capita tax on dues paid by the members supports the operation of provincial and Dominion commands. Payment of dues also entitles members to receive monthly issues of Legion magazine. Revenue from public campaigns support the service bureaus and the Legion's welfare programs. Financial assistance from party funds is available to ex-service people and their dependants whether or not they are Legion members.

Honourable senators, the bill before us has seven clauses, but the meat is to be found in clauses 3, 4 and 5. These clauses provide wider authority to Dominion command with respect to the revocation and suspension of charters, the winding up of branch or command operations, and the disposition of Legion property. The remaining clauses are either consequential on those three clauses, or they up-date the act in the light of present-day realities.

For example, section 4 of the act sets forth the purposes and objects of the Legion, and section 4(j) refers to the British Commonwealth and Empire. Clause 1 of the bill amends section 4(j) by deleting the words "British" and "and Empire". Similarly, subclause (2) of clause 1 eliminates the word "district" from paragraphs (q) (r) and (t) of section 4 of the act.

Section 6 of the act has to do with by-laws. Section 6(1)(h) defines the powers and rights of all commands and branches with respect only to the holding of assets. Clause 2 of the bill before you substitutes the word "property" for "assets" and extends the powers to include:

—acquiring, holding, mortgaging, leasing, pledging, selling, conveying or disposing of real or personal property.

The present section 6(1)(l) has to do with special departments. The present by-law authorizes a special department for assisting and advising ex-servicemen's clubs. The new by-law under paragraph (1), as set forth under clause 2, restricts these special departments to those required "for the protection of particular sections of ex-service men or for the carrying on of special work for the benefit of ex-service men."

The new by-law under section 6(1)(r), as set out in clause 2, enlarges the powers of the Dominion command to include suspension of officers, servants and agents of commands and branches.

Clause 2(2) of the bill before us adds three new by-laws, and re-numbers the present section 6(1)(s) as 6(1)(v).

Clause 3 of the bill is consequential on the other clauses and merely substitutes the word "property" for the word "assets," and the word "command" for "executive council," in section 9 of the act, which has to do with the rights of commands and branches.

Section 11 of the act sets forth the right of any command or branch to hold property. Clause 5 of the bill amends section 11 by adding a new subsection (2) which states that no branch may dispose of any property without the written consent of the appropriate provincial command. The amendments to section 11, now re-numbered 11(1), and that in clause 6, are all consequential.

Clause 7 is also a consequential amendment, and clears up an ambiguity in the present act with respect to ladies' auxiliaries.

Honourable senators, many years have passed since this act was last amended. The amendments contained in this bill are for the purpose of streamlining the act and bringing it up to date, so as to better cope with present-day problems. I therefore commend it to you for your support.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, July 16, 1976, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Since this motion is being moved at the request of the chairman of the committee, Senator Argue, I am sure honourable senators would like the explanation for it to be given by him.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the Minister of Agriculture has agreed to meet with the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture tomorrow afternoon at 3.30. The adoption of this motion will ensure that we can meet if the Senate is still sitting at that time. That is the reason for the motion.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY—ISSUE OF COMMEMORATIVE DOLLAR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform you that the Minister of Finance, the Honourable John N. Turner, today announced that the government plans to issue a commemorative dollar in 1976 commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the completion of the construction of the Library of Parliament. The design depicts a replica of the Library of Parliament. The words "Canada" and "Dollar" appear above the building and the dates 1876-1976 appear below.

I have no doubt that honourable senators will be pleased to hear this announcement, as the Library is a joint service of both Houses of Parliament and has rendered great service to all parliamentarians.

SMALL FARMS DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

NUMBER OF LOANS APPROVED FOR PROVINCES—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Michaud gave me notice that he wished to ask the following question today:

What is the number of applications for loans under the Small Farms Development Program approved for each province to June 30, 1975?

As I have said, Senator Michaud was kind enough to provide me with notice of his question on this important subject, a trend that would be useful for all senators to follow when the information requested is of a rather detailed variety. I appreciate it very much.

I have the detailed information in answer to Senator Michaud's question. It is in the form of a table, and I would ask leave of the Senate to provide Senator Michaud with a copy and have it printed in the Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows)

PERIOD SEPTEMBER 21, 1972, TO JUNE 30, 1975

| | VENDOR | PURCHASER |
|----------------------|--------|-----------|
| | GRANT | CREDIT |
| *British Columbia | 15 | 9 |
| Alberta | 1,752 | 230 |

Notes:

* Although British Columbia had signed the Agreement, that province had no loans approved for the period September 21, 1972 to March 31, 1973.

 Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Quebec signed Agreements during the fiscal year 1973-74; therefore, no approvals are included in the totals for these provinces for the period September 1972 to March 31, 1973.

FLORIDA LAND DEALS

ALLEGED SWINDLE—INVOLVEMENT OF CANADIANS— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the following question was asked by Senator Desruisseaux on Wednesday, June 4 last:

Honourable senators, recently we read in our newspapers of what may be the largest land swindle in the history of the United States, involving 30,000 to 80,000 people and up to $1 billion in lost investments.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if it is known whether Canadians have been victimized in this swindle. If so, what is their number and what are the amounts of money involved?

In reply to Senator Desruisseaux's question as to whether or not Canadians have in fact been victimized in the alleged swindle, it should be pointed out that this would appear to be a case involving Florida land regulations and state criminal laws relating to fraud. Canadians who have suffered from the alleged swindle could have legal recourse via a civil action by solicitors acting on their behalf in Florida. However, as you can appreciate, the Department of Justice could not be involved.

The only means of determining how many Canadians were involved and what sums of moneys were lost would be through representations to the Florida authorities. It is regrettable in this case that the Canadian federal authorities were unable to take direct action.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT, NO. 2

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-53, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, No. 2.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

OLYMPIC (1976) ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Deschatelets for second reading of Bill C-63, to amend the Olympic (1976) Act.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators—

Senator Deschatelets: Before Senator Macdonald proceeds, I wonder if he would permit me to answer a question asked by Senator Buckwold yesterday?

Senator Macdonald: Certainly.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Buckwold asked me the following question:

What quantity of gold in ounces is it estimated will be required for this program, and what effect will the presumably large market demand have on the price of gold in terms of the world price of gold? Does the mover of the bill feel that this could have a serious impact on the long-term economy of the country?

The answer I have received is as follows. The Olympic coin program of the Post Office Department hopes to be able to sell 210,000 coins with half-ounce fine gold content, and 500,000 coins with quarter-ounce fine gold content. This will result in the following usage of gold: 210,000 coins containing a half-ounce of fine gold would amount to 105,000 troy ounces, which I am told is a special measure for precious metal and does not correspond exactly to the usual ounce measure; 500,000 coins containing one-quarter ounce of fine gold will equal 125,000 troy ounces. There will be a total of 230,000 troy ounces, which represents about 1½ per cent of our gold reserve.

The experts who have been consulted think that no possible effect on the gold market can be anticipated; first, because the gold is already in the hands of the government and does not have to be purchased on the market, and I presume does not have to be replaced after it is converted into coins; secondly, the gold will be sold as coins on the coin market and not as gold on the gold market. According to the experts, the quantity of gold involved is not sufficient to have a significant effect on the gold market.

Perhaps I can add this about the past experience with the silver coins. There are in circulation about 75 million silver coins. As far as can be estimated, about $65 worth of these coins have come back into circulation, surely not more than $100.

I hope this information answers Senator Buckwold's question.

• (1420)

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as mentioned by the sponsor, the bill is somewhat narrow in its concept. It does two things. It authorizes the minting of gold coins in the denomination of $100, with the profit going to the Olympic Games Committee. The coins are of two types. One will contain a half-ounce of gold and will be one inch in diameter and .075 of an inch thick. The other will be of the same denomination but contain only a quarter of an ounce of gold and be 1.1 inches in diameter and .067 of an inch thick. In all probability there will be a great deal of confusion between the two coins. I warn those present to be sure they get value for their money and not accept the cheaper coin rather than the more expensive one. As I understand it, the ration will be that for every two coins containing a half-ounce of gold there will be five containing a quarter-ounce.

It is hoped that the profit from the sale of these coins will be anywhere between $25 million and $40 million, which will help to promote the games. The price of gold enters into it, of course. It is of interest to note that back in 1967 there was an issue of $20 gold pieces, which actually contained more than a half-ounce of gold. The $20 gold piece issued in 1967 has more gold content than the $100 issue for 1976. The price of gold is to be determined by a complicated formula. As I understand it, within ten days after the passing of this bill, the Minister of Finance must set the day on which the value is to be determined. When he sets that day, the value will be determined on the average of the preceding five days of the free market on the gold exchange in London. This is to show that the price is actually determined by the market so as not to give any unfair advantage to the Olympic coins.

Honourable senators, I am sure we all hope that this project will be of some benefit to the Olympic Games. I must say the fact that the sale of the silver coins did not come up to the anticipated amount does not show too well perhaps for the gold coins, that they will do any better.

Honourable senators, the second point I wish to raise relates to trademarks and copyrights. The Olympic Games Organization Committee must have the right to control this, otherwise there would be a flood of material coming in using the symbol of the games. This provision should have been in the original act but for some reason it was overlooked.

While the bill itself contains these two clauses, the discussion here has ranged over the whole question of payment for the games, especially if there should be any liability on the federal government towards the anticipated deficit. I feel it is agreed on all sides that there will be a substantial deficit. Originally the federal government agreed to do only two things—pass the necessary legislation to authorize these revenue-producing programs, such as the lottery, the stamps, the silver coins and now the gold coins; and secondly, to support the games through the various government departments and agencies. In other words, the federal government will assist in providing security, in helping with the expenses of the CBC and broadcasting, in helping the National Film Board, in helping to make the harbour at Kingston ready for the sailing events there, and other things of that kind. The assistance of the federal government will be in the neighbourhood of $130 million. However, that would not be all new money. For example, using the armed forces to assist with security will not cost very much, because the members of the forces will receive their pay in the ordinary course.

So, actually, the cost to the federal government should be much less than $130 million. Nevertheless, the security costs will in all probability be higher than anticipated, because—let's face facts!—in the light of the events of the last few years, not only will there be the normal security to take care of but there will also be the necessity of providing security against the added risk of terrorist raids. Foreign athletes, officials and spectators are coming to Canada, after all, and it is therefore the federal government which is responsible for their security. That security must be taken care of.

In any event, the federal government is restricting its liability to those two areas, and the understanding is that the deficit, if any, will be taken care of by the Province of Quebec and the City of Montreal. Indeed, as late as last Friday the Chairman of the Treasury Board restated that position of the federal government. Personally, I believe that position is totally wrong. Since it has been conceded that there will be a large deficit, surely we should re-examine the position of the financial liability of the federal government. I realize there is no point in rehashing the whole history of the thing and saying that this, that or the other thing should have been done—that the mayor of Montreal, for example, was wrong in his estimates or forecasts. There is no point in doing that. What we have to realize, though, is that these games will take place in Canada next year. That is a fact. Therefore, simply from the point of view of our national prestige, if nothing else, and quite apart from any other considerations, we must see that these games are a success. They must be staged in a first class manner.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: Never mind trying to pinch pennies. Never mind going economy fare. We want to put on a show of which all Canadians can be proud.

With respect to the deficit, I certainly think that all three levels of government should be involved. It is totally ridiculous that the federal government should not be paying a share. Let's face it: these games are not just a Montreal venture; they are not just a Quebec project; these games are a Canadian venture.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: They are simply being held in Montreal. As such they are the concern of all Canadians and are entitled to the enthusiastic support of all Canadians—and I believe all Canadians are prepared to give such support to these games.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I hope the sale of these gold coins will be helpful. It probably will. For that reason alone I support the bill. But I go further than that, in that I hope the attitude of the federal government will change, that it will move away its present position, away from the idea that there is no obligation upon the federal government to help cover the deficit. Of course, I realize, as we all do, that there is no legal obligation on the government, but surely it is obvious that conditions have changed markedly since the idea was conceived of holding the Olympic Games in Canada. In the light of those changed circumstances I should like to see the government adopt the attitude that since the Olympic Games are to be held in Canada in 1976 they are a Canadian venture and Canada should do everything in its power, financial and otherwise, to make them so successful that every Canadian can say, "I am glad that these games have been held in Canada and I am proud that Canadians could put them on and show all the world that we were not only prepared to stage them but were well able and willing to do so."

Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to support the bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, when I said to Senator Macdonald this morning that I might add a word after his speech on the bill, I think I spoke too soon.

● (1430)

[English]

Senator Macdonald has made a very good and intelligent speech; indeed, I do not know why I am on my feet now.

Senator Langlois: He always does.

Senator Asselin: In any event, I do wish to say something regarding this bill.

[Translation]

I want to say this because I have the impression that to begin with this bill was badly introduced in the other place by the Postmaster General. It is a bill which I think was badly explained; a bill that required a lot of consideration on the part of Opposition members to know its real content. I was surprised when this bill was introduced in the House of Commons. It was considered during a few hours in committee. When it came back to the house at the report stage, Conservative members introduced amendments, but I must say readily they were intelligent amendments because not only members of the official Opposition in the other place were asking questions, but so was the public in general as well. Amendments were introduced. Only one day was spent on the report stage of the bill. What grieved me most was that at the end of the day the minister used a political balloon when he said on television: "we are withdrawing the bill because Conservative members are against it and against the Olympics."

We in this party immediately received telephone calls from members of the Quebec government as well as the mayor of Montreal who were enquiring about our attitude. Did we want to kill the Olympics?
